Day of reckoning for direct grants

e six weeks ago, Mr Prentice told Par- ent that he intended to discontinue the ct grant for all pupils entering direct nt schools after 1975. "I believe", he , "it would be generally agreed that, n the point of view of all concerned, it now desirable to move as speedily as sible to avoid a protracted period of ertainty."

t the time of writing this, no further ement has emanated from Mr Prentice. it is only now that a letter from him he schools setting out the terms of his matum, is about to be sent. For reasons have not been explained, Mr Prentice's of moving as speedily as possible is to e an announcement in Parliament, and n dither for the best part of two months re sending any formal communication he schools whose future is most directly cerned, or to their national association, to the local education authorities with m they must now negotiate if they wish emain within the public system. This is way to run a railroad.

his parliamentary statement Mr Pren- made clear that he would set a dead- —July or the end of the summer—by h the schools' governing bodies will to tell him whether they intend to e down, go independent, or seek to join maintained system as non-selective ols. To the charge that the time allowed the schools to make up their minds is fficient, it will be answered that there othing new to be said about the prin- e at issue. Many schools already know own mind, and have decided to go pendent. Of the others, all that will be d is a sincere declaration of intent, and rmination to seek a future that abjures ition. This would be enough for the of State to extend the present angements into a second phase of nego- tion. But in many places, schools will want to know what kind of deal with the local authority is inherently feasible before committing themselves to a declaration of intent: to act without finding out whether there is any prospect of a reasonable scheme would be imprudent and even dishonourable, in that it would mean attaching all sorts of mental reservations to the declaration of intent.

Not only will this take time, but time will often be needed to consult more than one authority—some schools take pupils from many. Other complications will arise for boarding schools, many of whose pupils come from out-county. There are 10,000 boarders at direct grant schools, many of whom are there because an l.e.a. has accepted their need for boarding. The chosen procedure is more or less forcing them to go independent, or face long years of uncertainty.

As for the sixth form college option argued in The Times on Tuesday, it is now clear that even this is not going to be open to any school if it wishes to retain academic selection. The only kind of sixth form college acceptable to Mr Prentice is one with open entry and a full range of courses for the whole 16-plus age group.

This must complicate the issue, and shows little sign of any real eagerness to bring those schools within the maintained sector. Either Mr Prentice has written the direct schools off as regrettable but necessary casualties of the relentless march of social progress, or he really doesn't realize how much teaching talent is going to be priced out of the means of most families.

The phasing out of the direct grant schools, even on Mr Prentice's timetable, must take till well into the 1980s, and the stability of the present Government is not so rock-solid as to convince the sceptics that it may not still be worth waiting patiently for the wind to change. If it does—and if Mr Prentice insists on squandering the opportunity to seek a new consensus—then we are thrown back again to the sterile slanging matches that characterize polarized party disputation about school organization. No one would suggest all the onus is on Mr Prentice—Mr St John-Stevas and Mrs Thatcher before him have never shown the remotest inclination to seek constructive compromise. But, even now, it is not too late to try.

Far from insisting that all institutions must do everything, Mr Prentice should examine once again the distinction between what is (to him) desirable, and what is necessary. It is genuinely necessary to abolish the 11-plus and stop separating pupils into different schools by ability in the first years of secondary education. But this does not mean that there is some golden law that says they must never be split up thereafter on academic lines.

Some flexibility of thinking on the comprehensive side is urgently needed if needless confrontations are to be avoided. By 16 certainly, by 14 probably, it would be expedient to allow some school systems to reflect, in organizational form, the differentiation that the curriculum itself provides.

If this were done—and urgent thought were thereupon transferred to the curricular and examination questions discussed by Dr Harry Judge (page 2), it would make a great deal more sense than to beat the direct grant schools on the head with a big stick, while pretending that the curricular consequences are no business of the Secretary of State in his new role as hatchet man.

Twist to the spiral?

The teachers and their employers meet again in Burnham next week. The teachers are in a dilemma—the same dilemma which has led other unions to step up their demands above and beyond the levels envisaged in the TUC guidelines to which they are a party. Are they to restrict their claim to the official cost-of-living figure, and cooperate with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his anti-inflation strategy? Or are they to take their cue, not from the cost-of-living index, but from "comparability"—and make a short-term profit from the success which other groups of workers in notionally similar forms of employment have had in pushing the average rate of pay increase well above the cost-of-living figure?

The NUT have been seduced from the paths of righteousness and have decided to compromise: instead of limiting their claim to the cost of living, they have edged it up to 26 per cent, which is modestly below the 30 per cent plus quoted for wage rates. Of course there is a logic behind the 26 per cent figure; the NUT's discovery in recent years that sophisticated figuring pays off has seen to that, and the Houghton report' sassumption of parity with the Civil Service provides the rationale. But in essence this is an understandable, and perhaps forgivable, attempt to scrounge a bit more while purporting to stand by support hitherto pledged to the last remnants of the social contract.

Meanwhile the National Association of Schoolmasters, as usual, are barracking from the sidelines. With a splendid show of moral rectitude, they have put their hands upon their hearts and vowed they could not possibly accept more than the straight cost-of-living index. They also object to the NUT's attempt to weight the increase in favour of the lower paid, thereby undoing part of the effect of Houghton.

What you make of these manoeuvres depends on what you think of the social contract. Many people are sceptical about it as anything more than a political device to enable Mr Wilson to mobilise trade union support in the latter months of Mr Edward Heath's administration. But the NUT cannot have the luxury of such scepticism, because they have backed the Contract in the TUC, and owe their recent Houghton award to the "special case" doctrine which presupposes some more rational method of settling pay claims than leapfrog or smash and grab.

If, in the wake of Houghton, the teachers' reject a pay offer on social contract lines, it will be through relying on some dubious quibble or else by frankly agreeing to substitute comparability (the Houghton doctrine) for the limited cost-of-living calculation implied by the social contract. Whatever they do, it would be surprising if the authorities were to hasten to raise their offer—certainly not now that they know that some cut in planned teacher numbers has now become part of DES policy. They know that a 20 per cent pay increase on top of Houghton, the London allowance, and the stress area payments will mean that some teachers can, in any case, expect to be 60 or 70 per cent better off than 12 months ago, and that the rates have taken a pasting making this possible.

But when all this is said, if the teachers this time receive less than the 30 per cent plus which industrial unions like the dockers have received, and no doubt the railwaymen will get, or the 26 per cent which other comparisons suggest, then it already becomes necessary to look forward to a re-run of Houghton and another twist to the inflationary spiral.

Trahisôn des clercs

There is much to be said in favour of the DES's latest report (page 13) on the library services. It reflects—and gives encouragement to—an entirely laudable movement now gaining impetus. Lending records, putting on concerts and exhibitions, providing rooms for adult education groups and acting as general cultural information centres—all these have now become more or less taken for granted as part of the good local library's function. Most of the ramifications to these activities suggested in the report are imaginative and likely ultimately to make yet more converts to the book. And there is no doubting the need for this; it is appropriate that libraries should join he campaign to reduce adult illiteracy, and that a new DES working party should begin to examine ways in which the library services might bridge the gap between themselves and their further-flung potential clients. The working party's concern for the partially sighted is particularly welcome.

But there have been indications—not only in the introductory remarks of its authors but in the report itself—that we may be witnessing yet another small trahison des clercs. Profuse and unsolicited apologies for the middle-class overtones of the word "culture" sound oddly enough in this context; a declaration that libraries have been too concerned with the needs of readers sounds distinctly ominous.

By all means let libraries reflect the needs of their respective communities, and by all means let them become "places of entertainment and enjoyment" but, limitations on space being what they are, too crude and enthusiastic a pursuit of such objectives might result in the destruction of that quiet, purposeful atmosphere which is one of the characteristics of good libraries wherever situated. Moreover, while books are expensive, materials for "non-book media" are often more so. Given an even colder financial wind, and a library service busily expiating its guilt for its "middle-class" concern with "readers", is it entirely fanciful to envisage literary culture being gradually elbowed out? Heaven preserve us from a new generation of librarians who regard books as a wicked middle-class obsession.

Persons will be persons

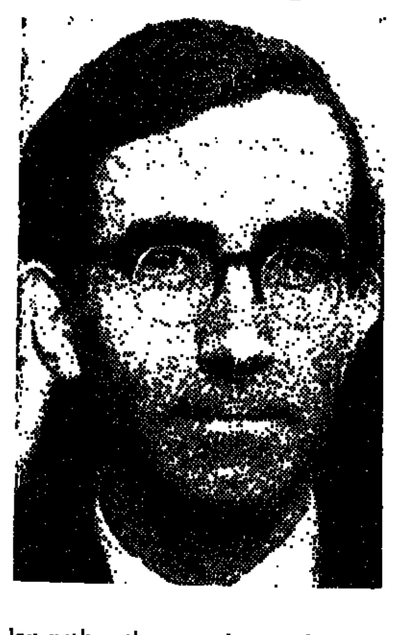
The DES survey of curricular differences for boys and girls (page 00) is a welcome, sensible, if limited, document. The sort of survey the inspectors have carried out needs to be repeated at regular intervals if it is to give any indication of the way curricular choices and opportunities are changing. It should also be freed from departmental limitations and coupled with surveys of employment opportunities and family patterns so as to provide some objective information on whether the school curriculum is developing in harmony with the other social changes affecting women's roles.

Inevitably, a slim document of 29 pages skirts over some fundamental questions which, in a plural society, defy straight answers. How much should the schools take their cue from the job market? What are the limits of the school's function as an instrument of social reform? How much individual choice is compatible with some form of public curriculum?

Within its limitations, the report shows how choices are now distributed, and their relationship to popular assumptions about what is appropriate to boys and girls in the sex roles attributed to them. Given the libertarian requirement that individuals must make their own choices, the schools should aim to make the options as real as possible. But they cannot claim (nor should they accept) all the responsibility for how they are exercised.

Goodbye to some sacred cows

Harry Judge



I hope that parents, administrators and politicians (as well as the teachers who form the bulk of TES readership) will now be given the pleasure of seeing the debate on comprehensive schools move out of the sterile desert in which it has been circling for five years and more.

There has been plenty of opportunity of late to reflect miserably on the state into which that discussion has sunk. The publication of yet another Black Paper (is it the thirty-first or the thirty-second?) has provided an occasion for yet another display of gladiatorial posturing.

Television has much to answer for, and the spectacle of confrontation between the goodies and the baddies—which ever way round you apply these labels—has ceased even to entertain. Of course, it must be a good thing when powerful media reflect a public concern for education; but it is a bad thing when that concern it distorted by producing tactics appropriate to all-in wrestling, or the simple-minded oppositions of political duellists.

All the more welcome, therefore that Stuart Maclure (TES, April 18) should—as the tenth anniversary of 10/65 approaches—offer a provocative attempt to find a middle way. What is now being offered (as The Times recognized last week) is a practical manageable proposal about secondary school organization which all men of good will should applaud, improve and adopt.

It is idle to pretend that there survives—in secondary schools, in colleges and departments of education, in le.a.s, even in the hearts of bruised sociologists—any powerful conviction that the present phase of comprehensive planning will bring great educational improvement, or even be worth doing at all. A great deal of progress (and I mean progress) has been made, and now is a time for consolidation and settlement. What form might they take?

Lest any force in my support for Mr Maclure's argument is destroyed by the accusation that I am just a tired ex-headmaster who has changed his mind, or lost his faith, my argument reflects a view that is central and moderate (for these reasons, one would hope, not unwelcome to Mr Prentice) and has remained tolerably consistent over the past decade.

'Reform which is so long overdue'

From 1965 to 1970, as a member of the Public Schools Commission, I shared the general hope that we should find ways of developing and modifying links with independent and direct grant schools. In 1970 I enjoyed the hospitality of these columns in an argument about the word "comprehensive", protesting that it was a term of mystifying looseness which should never attract an adverb (like "truly").

The year 1972 marked a stage in the continuing argument about examinations: we shall never develop an accepted national system of common secondary schools until we loosen our grip on the dogma of examinations for all at 16 plus.

Mr Maclure argues that we should now be content in outlawing the 11 plus, in developing (whether as institutions or organizational concepts) common middle schools, in a word with the final abolition of secondary modern schools. This is the reform which is so long overdue. An acceptance of this position means that we must all wave goodbye to some of our long-cherished sacred cows: "fully comprehensive" systems (an adverb again), 11-18 schools for all, official equality of status for all schools, the exclusion of further education.

The reasons are obvious enough. Nobody believes that an orthodox system of 11 to 18 comprehensive schools for all big cities even begins to make sense. Nor is it possible to dismiss as hostile propaganda the massive doubts so many people entertain about neighbourhood schools for all.

The spectacle of schools now making a contribution to public education and being pushed by circumstances into independence and isolation cheers nobody. Attempts through Parliament to force a handful of l.e.a.s to cook up doctrinally acceptable schemes are likely to delay rather than accelerate the demise of the secondary modern. The great underlying strength of the secondary revolution, so far, has been the surprisingly broad support for it: sacrifice that (when there is no money about, anyway) and a reaction towards selective schools may begin to develop in surprising places.

Surely, those of us who believe in ending selection at 11-plus have enough confidence in the strength of our arguments and the quality of our experiences to give them a little longer to prevail. Meanwhile, the prohibition by law of selection before the age of 14 (although that statesmanlike limitation of objective will cause ritual howls from predictable quarters) would help to maintain a momentum for orderly development, and inject a new vigour into the talk about what we really mean by choice, curriculum, objectives, selection and assessment within a comprehensive system.

It would, at the same time, separate arguments about ideology from arguments about the size of schools (a topic of crucial importance in its own right) and give the direct grant and independent schools one more opportunity—surely their last—to find the right relationship with a public system which needs them, as they need it.

All that is needed is some rearrangement of perspectives, a willingness to look at old problems and aspirations in a new way, to admit that most of us have been wrong about some things in the 30 years since the 1944 Act came into effect.

Of course, there will be difficulties and the path of wisdom would now be able to recognise and assess them. The most obvious, but least alarming, problem is that many spokesmen in the educational world will denounce what Mr Maclure has proposed. It will be seen as a compromise, a betrayal, a failure to appreciate the full evangelical force of comprehensivism.

Beyond the bounds of reason and democracy

But few of the protests will come from those concerned with maintaining and developing the system, or from those using it (as parents). I am not suggesting that the protests will be trivial: only that those who wish to argue for a more orthodox all-in solution will be free to advertise its claims, but will trespass beyond the bounds of reason and democracy if they continue to insist on the absolute rightness of their own solution for all areas and all schools.

Other difficulties are more substantial. We need to clarify what we mean by a comprehensive cycle up to the age of 14, to explain how (as in Sweden) the notion of an educational phase can be applied in buildings and organizations with other and complementary purposes, to examine the arguments for and against easy transfer at 14-plus (for example, from one 11-18 school to another).

A sustained and cool discussion of the differences between comprehensive systems and comprehensive schools is, in any case, very much overdue. Only the vested interests or unimaginative conservatism of those who are dependent upon th maintenance of the present instit tional patterns of schooling has d layed it for so long.

One of the less clear passages Mr Maclure's article refers to t curriculum, and I hope it is not tended that there should be so standardized national diet for 11 to 14-year-olds. At the same ti (and especially if the 16-plus exa nation system crumbles away) p posals to establish minim standards in basic skills and disc lines should now—especially af the Bullock report—be welcome

There is no inconsistency whate in arguing that schools for 11 to 1 year-olds (whether standing on th own or working within larger or nizations) should be as free as p sible in developing their o curricula and teaching styles, wh urging the virtues of a national s tem for monitoring standards. T degree of accountability is sur now the necessary and modest pr for a unique and profoundly valu freedom.

Equality and excellence could be reconciled

One of the benign effects reordering our thoughts around t age of 14 would be to prom institutional diversity and openn from that age onwards: put anoth way, the competing claims equality and of a diversity excellences could be reconciled. the risks of an unhealthy prolife tion of narrow and over academ schools at 14-plus would slight: public pressure and p fessional opinion would secure network of opportunities at 14-plu

More discussion is, of cour needed on how in particular are the system from 14-plus shou develop. In some places, a sing institution might provide eve thing: in others, choice would maximized and provision would (it should) reflect the demands pupils and the needs of t economy.

It is of great importance to rec that, at the age of fourteen, pu choice is vocal and effective; t risks of too many students follo ing irrelevant grammar school s jects are slender—only margina greater, for example, than that unsuitable pupils in splendidly op comprehensive schools putt themselves down for pure ma matics at A level.

The key to reform remains t examination system and t questionable uses to which it is no put. Sensible choices are unlike to be made, by parents or even young people at 14-plus, for as lo as we keep our present arrang ments.

But if these can be reformed, we can escape from an obsessio with total assessment at 16-plus, we can sell to one another and th public at large the notion of th leaving or graduation diploma, we can see that a huge, nation examination system should ha little to do with the necessary an subtle business of selection f higher education, then the ice which we are now frostily i prisoned will begin to crack.

It may seem paradoxical that argument for preserving the best our present school system, for pr tecting (among other things) th noble traditions of grammar scho education, should be so close linked with modifying that examin tion system which, for so man people, is the chief guarantee academic standards. It may see paradoxical that an argument fo the freedom of schools should b linked so closely with a plea th their achievements should be com prehensively monitored. But thing have changed. If 4/74 can sho join 10/65 in the archaeology o education, and if Mr Prentice ca promote a Bill which stops short o what the ancient prophets of com prehensivism will want, then a har pressed but not yet demoralized sy tem will be given the chance t develop a greater flexibility, withi a broad political consensus, and s preserve those elements in our schools which American well wishers persist in admiring.

Dr Harry Judge is director of t Oxford University department o education studies.

Children at risk: teachers must act

by Bob Doe

Teachers have a crucial role to play in the detection of children at risk from non-accidental injury, says a report from East Sussex County Council, the local authority responsible for the area in which Maria Colwell was killed.

The report, part of the county's "considered response" to the official inquiry into Maria's death, calls for more training to help teachers to recognize the signs of neglect. It also urges closer cooperation between teachers, social workers and all the organizations likely to come in contact with families with children at risk.

It lays down "rules of practice" for educational welfare officers and suggests a comprehensive scheme of children's school records which would be open to social workers and EWOs.

"The closest contact the county council has with children in the county is while they are at school", says the report, which was compiled by a panel of seven county councillors. "The class teacher is in an absolutely vital position because he or she is the first to know when the child is absent."

Teachers may not be aware of what to look out for. "The indications of neglect or failure to thrive include the dirty, tired and listless child. The child's size, weight and development are inexplicably retarded and belie the child's actual age." They may have a look of "frozen watchfulness", the demeanour of a much older person.

It was unreasonable to expect teachers to be able automatically to recognize these signs. Training in this should be included in in-service and basic teacher training.

Where teachers discover children at risk they or the head should telephone the social services department and confirm their suspicions in writing within two days. If they suspect a criminal offence involving non-accidental injury, they should also consider informing the police. In any case, the head should inform the EWO.

"We see that it is the duty of the head teacher to encourage face to face contact in all identified cases between the class teacher and the social worker and, where necessary, to relieve the class teacher of duties to enable this contact to take place.

"The social worker should keep the head teacher properly informed of the developments of the case. A written record should be made of any discussions between class teacher and social worker and attached to the school record card and included in the social services department's records."

In Brighton, where Maria died, school records had not been regarded as a matter of routine and there had been failures of communication between heads and EWOs, the report says. Guidelines on record keeping had been issued to heads. The records were "for use by the school or by any other persons who share responsibility for the child, including EWOs, social workers and the careers advisory service".

All schools should have a standard form requesting the EWO to investigate the absence of a child or to take other action. EWOs would use the reverse side to report back to the school when the form would be added to the child's records.

Social services should inform the head in writing about important decisions affecting a child such as the issuing or modification of a care or supervision order. Schools should inform social workers when a child was referred to the child guidance, school psychological or school medical services.

The report calls for an all-round improvement in trust and communication between the various organizations working with children. It questions the continuation of the Educational Welfare Service in its present form and suggests a special study of whether it should continue to exist outside social services in the long term.

In the short term it lays down 17 rules of practice for EWOs to unify and clarify practice within the county. These put an obligation on the EWO to consult with teachers and to report to social services when a child is subject to a care or supervision order.

Communications with the NSPCC, police, Probation Service, housing and health authorities should all be improved. The county could assist the school medical service by seeking general written consent from parents for medical examinations of a child and to allow disclosure of medical information about a child to the school.

The county should also be prepared to legally indemnify head teachers who, acting in good faith, have children medically examined without parental consent. This might render the county and head liable to action at law.

Representations should be made to the Home Office by the county council to allow the police to provide the social services with any prejudicial information they might have about prospective step-fathers, foster parents or natural parents when a decision as to the placement or return of a child is to be made.

The report says that East Sussex is considering an index of known and seriously suspected cases of non-accidental injury. "We believe the index to be urgent and essential for the protection of children at risk."

A special unit to help parents driven to injuring their children is suggested. This would include counselling and a life-line telephone service on a Samaritan basis. "Its costs would be very high, but its dividends immeasurable."

Boyle plea for minorities

More attention must be paid to the educational needs of minority groups, Lord Boyle, Vice-Chancellor of Leeds University, told a conference organized by the Leeds Careers Association this week.

Their further education needs "may reveal where the main thrust in education in the next decade will have to come".

Among the 150 delegates to the conference—on the further education and employment of minority groups—were careers officers, community workers and industrial liaison officers.

Lord Boyle told them that minority groups traditionally looked to education as an escape route from impoverished backgrounds. Further education gave the many coloured minorities in Britain a second chance.

"However, the second chance aspect of FE colleges has not received enough attention. The importance of industrial training alongside further education has tended to be ignored in the last few years."

It would always be easier in a time of economic recession to discriminate against minority groups. Coloured people with experience and ability were often barred from jobs because they did not possess the necessary paper qualifications.

Members of minority groups often needed more time to gain these. "Without necessary language abilities and basic qualifications, training schemes are often closed to members of minority groups and by the time they have gained these skills they are usually too old to qualify for training schemes."

Careers advisers could do more to widen opportunities by giving minorities more time to select careers to which they were best suited. They often needed advice on careers long after they had left school.

"Attention to the needs of minorities is not just a luxury or an act of generosity. It is in all our interests to pay attention to them."

Dr Alan Little, director of reference and technical services, Community Relations Commission, said that unemployment was twice as high among young blacks as among their white counterparts.

Youngsters born in Britain might be more vulnerable than their immigrant parents because they were living in two worlds. "They are neither full members of British society nor full members of their own black society."

Union's set to sidestep social contract

by Sue Cameron

Teachers' leaders agreed this week to demand a 26 per cent pay increase that could add £370m to the present salary bill.

The Burnham teachers' panel decided on Wednesday that it would be better to sidestep the social contract than lose all they had gained from the Houghton award.

And the unions intend to cite Mr Reg Prentice himself in support of their claim. At the National Union of Teachers' conference at Easter the Education Secretary said the Government would be "selling teachers short" if they allowed them to fall so far behind in pay that another Houghton exercise was necessary.

The unanimous decision to go for a 26 per cent rise—4.8 per cent more than the social contract's cost of living rule allows—marks a sharp about-turn on the part of the Joint Four and the National Association of Schoolmasters. Earlier in the week the Assistant Masters' Association and the NAS were saying they would not back any pay claim that broke the social contract.

It seems they were won round by the NUT representatives, who have a dominant voice on the panel.

At the end of Wednesday's meeting there was still deep division between the NUT and the other unions over how the increases should be distributed. The NUT want to give the lowest paid 42 per cent, which would give those on the minimum an extra £13.50 a week. But the NUT plan would mean much smaller rises for those at the top of the scales and some high earning heads would receive as little as 14.5 per cent.

The NAS want all teachers to receive 21.2 per cent and they want only the extra 4.8 per cent to be used to help those on the bottom scales and to iron out some of the anomalies created by Houghton. It is understood that while the Joint Four and the National Association of Head Teachers also want to help the lowest paid they are anxious to maintain Houghton differentials.

Mr Fred Jarvis, general secretary of the NUT, said this week that the new pay claim was based on the teachers' determination to keep level with the Civil Service, who have just been given a salary rise equal to 26 per cent over a year.

"We are only seeking to maintain Houghton. The Houghton report says that teachers' pay can be compared to that of civil servants, and if we are going to keep up with the Civil Service, it will mean having a bigger rise than the cost of living increase. The teachers were a special case under the social contract and we are putting a legitimate interpretation on the contract in trying to keep the value of the Houghton awards."

The teachers will meet the management at a full Burnham meeting on Monday.

200 years of independence

A major exhibition marking the bicentenary in 1976 of the American War of Independence will be sponsored at the National Maritime Museum, Greenwich, by The Times and The Sunday Times. It will be a mammoth project on the scale of the Tutankhamun and Chinese exhibitions.

"1776" will tell the story of the events and battles during this turbulent period in American history, as well as highlighting the personalities whose ideas and ideals influenced the conflict and its eventual outcome. It will do so with the aid of new audio-visual techniques, music and setpieces designed to place the visitor in an eighteenth-century environment.

The exhibition will open in April and be open to the public until October.

The same booking arrangements for schools will be made as were done for the previous exhibitions. About one day a week will be set aside for primarily school parties. Preliminary details will be sent out towards the end of the summer term and booking will start early in the autumn term.

Curricula unfair to girls—and boys

School curricula unfairly and unnecessarily militate against the personal development and career prospects of girls—and boys—according to an HMI's report published by the DES this week.

Drawing on surveys and the impressions HMIs gain in their work, the report says that boys and girls are treated differently from nursery and infant stages, right through to secondary schools, often simply because of unquestioned custom, limited resources or for convenience.

Only in middle schools has fresh thinking given rise to "a deliberate policy of minimizing sex differences in the planning of the curriculum". Restrictive curriculum patterns in over a quarter of English secondary schools deny opportunities for studying certain subjects to both boys and girls.

In nursery and infant schools, HMIs say boys and girls are expected to behave differently and do. Boys may be provided with mechanical things because it is thought these will interest them; the teacher often makes less effort to interest girls in such things or to respond to attention given to them by girls.

This three-dimensional experience may be an advantage to boys when it comes to forming spatial concepts and some of the basic notions of physical science, but boys are probably at a disadvantage when it comes to learning to read.

Early reading books draw largely on home life for their material and it is the girls who relate to this more easily.

"Mechanical and spatial experience is necessary for young girls just because their verbal powers grow more quickly than those of boys. Experience suggests that boys are probably at a disadvantage because their robust interests rarely form a basis for early reading material."

Formal divisions between the sexes begin with crafts and physical education. Girls do needlework and the boys more three-dimensional work.

Middle schools illustrate "a welcome trend towards mixed classes for crafts" but a few in an HMI survey of 113 middle schools segregated pupils according to sex for religious education, rural science and art.

Separation for games and physical education increases with age in middle schools and is more widespread in urban areas. This is carried on into the secondary schools.

Insisting that technical drawing be taught only when linked to metalwork, a boys-only option, is what the report calls a pre-emptive curriculum pattern. This pattern was found to apply to sciences, commerce, and languages in years one to three in 27 per cent of a sample of English schools.

Premature specialization restricting later subject choices affected boys more than girls in both single-sex and mixed schools. Composite courses, rather than free choice of individual subjects, were found in one school in four, giving rise to engineering courses for boys, commerce for girls or CSE courses described as "humanities" in which girls were particularly likely to be involved.

Girls were less likely to be able to take physics or chemistry at O level than boys, though boys missed out on biology and modern languages.

At A level, three times as many boys as girls took mathematics and economics, while between two and three times as many girls as boys took English literature. Sex differentiation between subjects in secondary schools were more distinct in mixed schools than in single-sex schools.

WHAT DO YOU DO
IF YOU CANNOT WAIT UNTIL 1976
FOR A PLACE IN THE OPEN UNIVERSITY?

The Open University is now coping with 'the problems of success' ... no room for new admissions until January 1976

But the student impatient to start a degree course doesn't have to wait a year: he (or she) can start work immediately for a London University degree, and study at home as well.

Wolsey Hall (who have been coping with problems of success since 1894) can accept students for a very wide range of degree courses, and a great many other diplomas, certificates, and professional qualifications.

As everyone in the field of education must already know, Wolsey Hall students have an enviable record of success in London University degrees and diplomas – over a period of years, the pass rate in some subjects has been 87%, 91%, and even 97%.

Degree courses include B.A. honours in English, French, History, Philosophy or Geography, B.Sc. Economics, B.Sc. Alternative I, B.Sc. Alternative II specialising in Mathematics or Geography, LLB and B.D.

All applicants are given the opportunity of receiving a specimen lesson absolutely free and before they have paid any fees; this solves the notorious problems of the student who finds out – too late – that he has bitten off more than he can chew.

Students who are unable to secure an educational authority grant have the opportunity of paying fees by instalments, with the extra advantage of the guarantee of further free tuition if they do not pass their examinations the first time. The Prospectus is worth studying. Write to:

Pupils in limbo: who will look after the rejects?

Last week the TES described how a magistrate's persistence led to identification of a group of children who are being effectively excluded without right of appeal from Birmingham schools—the children trying to reenter the system from custodial care or detention.

We talked to a group of the city's most experienced heads some of whom played a key part in formulating its new policy for dealing with children in danger of exclusion. Three special units have been set up to take 45 children who have been formally suspended but the discussion revealed attitudes which may also be at the root of the problem facing the "limbo kids".

The Birmingham heads, like many of their colleagues elsewhere, are convinced that reforms in the treatment of child offenders have landed schools with a greatly increased problem. Latest Home Office figures do not seem to bear this out.

There is no question of Birmingham's schools having become less tolerant of disruptive behaviour, insist the five heads.

They repudiate any suggestion that the increasing use of suspension is a response to pressure from militant teachers. The heads, who include a prominent member of the NUT executive, discount the effect of protests against disruptive behaviour and call for tighter discipline.

They say the use of suspension has increased to meet a real growth in violent and offensive behaviour of a kind and on a scale which threatens the ability of schools to function.

The heads identify three main factors as responsible for this extreme behaviour. Two of these are general social changes—a deterioration of standards in increasing violence in adult society, and the growing number of unstable homes.

The third is more specific, and easier to test. The 1969 Children and Young Persons Act, the heads claim, has loaded onto the schools the task of coping with far more of the criminal or violent children than before. Pupils who would in the past have been removed from the school system for long periods by the courts and sent to approved schools or borstals are now treated more leniently. They are left free to continue their anti-social behaviour in the classroom.

The heads say that while they may be able to "contain" one or two pupils of this kind at a time, they dare not allow more than a handful to build up in the same school. That is frequently why heads refuse to take on straight away a pupil who has been thrown out of another school. "We have to wait until some of the other trouble makers have left", they say.

Home Office figures on the treatment of children convicted by the courts do not appear, however, to support the heads' picture of what is happening. The total convicted in 1973, the last year for which figures are available, was 117,000, some 3,000 fewer than in the year before the Act came into force.

But there was an increase of more than 3,000 in the number of offenders committed to some form of custodial treatment or into care. A good many of the children in care attend ordinary schools, but they either live in community or foster homes, or are subject to close control by social workers.

And—more significant—a much higher proportion of the persistent or serious offenders are going into close custody. The number of detention orders has risen by more than half: nearly twice as many youngsters are being sent to borstal.

In contrast, the number of those left free under a supervision order—the system which has replaced probation—has dropped by 3,600.

And not all of Birmingham's heads would agree privately with the claim that teacher pressures do not seriously affect headmasters' decisions to exclude a pupil. One head who wrote to the education department, declining to take a boy, explained: "The present collective strength of staffroom democracy leaves me with a reduced margin of goodwill."

The chairman of the city's education committee, Miss Sheila Wright, says that she would rather avoid any direct comment on the heads' views. But she feels that "there may be rather higher expectations than there used to be of how pupils should behave".

No place for case number 15

There are 15 children in Birmingham this week who cannot get into schools because heads fear their records of crime or disturbed behaviour. There is no chance that they will be admitted to one of the new special units either.

These children are ones who have come out of detention or are in community homes. Because they have never been formally suspended, they are not eligible for the special units. Miss Sheila Wright, the education committee chairman, says the committee are very concerned about the children, but that their resources are fully stretched in providing the special units for pupils already in the school system.

Miss Wright's concern is clearly shared by the education department's senior staff. Last week a probation officer phoned to report the fifteenth case—a child newly before the court, and likely to be placed in care.

A case conference was hurriedly fixed — probation officer, social worker, head of the school it was hoped might accept him, parents, educational administrators, the child himself. "All we can do is try to persuade the head concerned to take him: in the end, we cannot force a school to accept a child against its judgment."

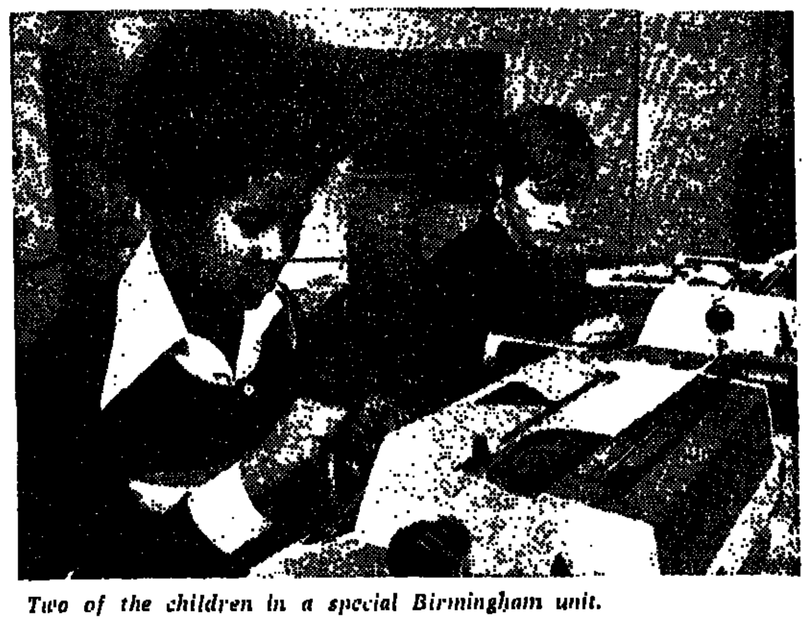
If the boy gets into the school he will be a good deal more fortunate than most of the children on the new list, some of whom have been waiting for a school to take them since the autumn.

Often, of course, the children concerned are educationally behind and need remedial facilities which may already be overstretched.

The reports show the dismally inevitable correspondence between the home background and juvenile crimes, truancy, and alienation. The social workers warn that, left to wander the streets for months, the children are bound to get into more trouble.

Birmingham's education department go on wheeling and dealing with their reluctant heads, knowing that they have no answer to this small vicious problem. One senior official said: "Neither social services nor ourselves have the money to set up the facilities for intermediate treatment that are needed: the financial cutbacks mean that social services are having to reduce very drastically even the limited amount they were spending in this field.

"The irony of it all is that if we cannot do something more effective for these children, they are likely to cost the community a good deal more in the end."



Two of the children in a special Birmingham unit.

'They're not ashamed of being here'

The unthinkable thought in Birmingham is that the boys and girls sent to the new special units will refuse ever to go back to school. They may decide that they have got a better deal than anything the ordinary schools can offer.

The heads and the chairman of the education committee explain that this is not what the units are for. The whole purpose is to enable the pupils to sort themselves out, to learn how to create and sustain relationships, to adjust. There is no question of providing a permanent alternative education of the sort that free schools may offer and which would cost the corporation three or four times as much.

The head of the unit I visited is not so sure. I was with him when one of his first pupils came back to see him a week after leaving to take a job. She spends the day with the nine other founding pupils of the unit, which opened in October. She brings us our coffee.

Why was she giving up one of her few days of freedom now that she was over the leaving age? "Because I like him", she says, pointing to the unit's head. Is she going back to see her old school? "Never." It is not bitter or aggressive; but it is quite final.

Like most of the others, Alice a few months ago wanted desperately to be taken back by the school that threw her out. The school was adamant; she was intolerable, insufferable, aggressive, argumentative, uncooperative, they said.

The unit's head has no doubt it was all true. But in all the time she has been at the centre, Alice has been cautious and polite with the staff—and has turned herself, unaided, into a highly proficient typist who has found it easy to get a job. She is clearly the big success story.

Peter, 14-year-old son of a middle-class couple, still makes it plain that he doesn't much like work, although he has done a good deal of it clearing the rubble heap outside to make an adventure playground. Peter sees the unit as the last hope.

Nick, despite a record which includes breaking into a house and repeated "molestation" of women, is gentle to the point of effeminacy. His manner led at first to his rejection by the rest of the group. He volunteers for all the domestic chores still, but the effeminacy is changing as he begins to copy the model of male behaviour among the others. His work as well as his behaviour is improving steadily.

Mark is the worst tempered member of the group. His adopted mother died when he was very young, and the woman who replaced her walked out recently because she could not stand Mark. He dreams of finding his real mother, whom he is sure drives around in a big car. The unit's head says: "He still flares up quickly, but when he calms down he is marvellous."

The squalls, however, are purely verbal. Most of the group have some kind of record of physical violence, some of threats or attacks on teachers. No one has tried to beat up the head—perhaps because he is a former middleweight champion.

At 45, he has no doubt that running the unit is what he wants to do. A former PE teacher, he took a counselling course a couple of years ago. He expects politeness and gets it; nobody barges into his room without knocking.

The range of studies is, for the moment, limited; but by the needs of the pupils rather than by resources. The head is confident he will be able to obtain whatever sort of tuition the pupils need—with the help, perhaps, of the further education colleges. He will be delighted, he says, if he has some time in the future to arrange A level courses.

A question of cost

One of the people whose work I have admired most over several years is Dr Mia Kellmer Pringle, and though I have never met her, I have always assumed that she must be a person of robust common sense.

But as an assiduous reader of the Radio Times, I was brought up short by a letter from Mr H. E. Bell, of the University of Reading, which referred to the relative costs of educating schoolchildren and university students. Apparently Dr Kellmer Pringle had suggested that it costs fourteen times more to educate a university student than it does to educate a schoolchild.

Mr Bell quite rightly pointed out that this comparison was a bad one, since the university costs included very substantial elements of research, and therefore Dr Kellmer Pringle was not comparing like with like.

As I have spent a great deal of my life working on these rather prosaic matters, I was naturally interested (particularly since the conclusion I reached some years back, that unit costs of teaching in polytechnics in most courses are higher than those of the universities is now coming to be generally accepted).

The general pattern of comparisons of unit costs is one which raises considerable difficulties. The key figure is the pupil-teacher ratio, which is roughly half in the universities [illegible] less than that in the polys) what it is in the schools.

What brought me up short, however, was not this rather interesting point of Mr Bell's, but Dr Kellmer Pringle's response. I quote:

"While the universities are an important national asset, today's children are an even more important one, since the level of their intellectual and educational achievements will determine the quality of life enjoyed by tomorrow's society. It is during the first five to 10 years of life that the foundation is laid, not only for learning but for learning how to learn and for enthusiasm for things of the mind. Thus the quality of teaching and the size of group to be taught are vital at this early stage. Yet, in practice, students have the most highly paid teachers; and they enjoy groups as small as 10 on average, whereas many children are taught in classes of 35 to 40."

This series of statements seems to me to be well-meaning but to contain within it so much neglect of recent work as to be depressing. In the first place, remarkably few children are now taught in classes as large as 35 or 40. The national pupil-teacher "ratios" are well known, and the size of groups as taught can only be as high as 35 to 40 because the schools have arranged their teaching groups in this particular way, leaving other teachers free for different work.

Second, there has been extremely little evidence over the last 35 years that a reduction in the size of class beyond a certain point has any significant effect on known educational outcomes. I have been most reluctant myself to accept this research since it seems to fly in the face of common sense and professional experience, but one would expect some kind of reasoned refutation of the evidence from educational researchers to have emerged by this time.

It has not emerged, and one must question whether or not we have been right to pour quite so much of our educational effort into this single target of reducing the size of class. I fully accept this applies as much to higher education as to primary school education, but it is, nevertheless, an important point that ought not to be overlooked.

Third, Dr Kellmer Pringle really does seem to overlook the vast amount of evidence that the educational boom, through which we have just come, has not significantly raised the educational achievements of primary school children. This central fact seems to me to be something that progressive people will have to accept sooner rather than later as a basis of argument and to deal with. It is what gives force to the arguments advanced by supporters of the Black Paper.

These arguments are not refuted by denying what is now acknowledged by all reputable researchers in all countries to be a central fact—that the consequences of the increases in expenditure have not so far been a dramatic rise in educational attainment.

It is this which seems to me to be the major question which is going to come more and more to the fore in the period of declining real educational expenditures which we are now entering. For a variety of reasons education is no longer at the centre of the reforming programme of progressive people, and many of the educational changes seem to have gone off at half cock, while the social problems that they were directed at have become even more serious than they have been in the past, as is witnessed by the growth of the difficulties of the inner city areas.

It is important that progressive people and figures of national authority, such as Dr Kellmer Pringle, should not respond to perfectly moderate letters like those of Mr Bell by a kind of progressive diatribe which merely reinforces the opinion of moderate, intelligent and reasonably well-informed fellow-citizens that the primary school revolution has not "come off" and that therefore everything that has been done has been a mistake.

I am sure it is perfectly clear on many grounds that the primary school revolution has not been a mistake, and has in fact been one of the great liberalizing influences of this century. On the other hand, it is equally clear that in the process many of the more important pedagogic claims of the primary school revolution have not been met. The primary school revolution in this particular case is merely the exemplar of a large number of other changes in education which also have not been as successful as many of us hoped 10 years ago.

When educational spending is under attack, the right response, it would seem to me, is not to defend situations which facts and experience show to be indefensible, but rather to try to devise some new strategy which will not throw the baby out with the bathwater.

Mr Miller states his case

by Stephen Cohen

Mr Terence Miller, the director of the Polytechnic of North London, whose suspension has been demanded by his governors, wrote this week to the 29 other polytechnic directors in the country setting out the facts of his case.

Three pages of detailed history, a copy of the letter he wrote to the Education Secretary, a statment circulated to North London staff and a covering note landed on the desks of Mr Miller's fellow directors early this week. Most of them will remain unread for two weeks because a large group of directors are now in the United States on a visit.

Mr Miller was apparently not seeking support. Instead he was informing his colleagues of what happened at North London to lead the polytechnic's governors to vote 16 to nine for his suspension.

Any offers of help that come his way will probably be appreciated, but the publication of the February 18 letter to Mr Prentice is bound to upset many of the teaching staff at the polytechnic and harden their attitudes towards Mr Miller.

The letter, which he wrote without telling the academic board and the joint advisory committee set up to look at the polytechnic's problems, called for a bigger cut in student representation on the academic board, even though the board and the advisory committee had both agreed there should be 11 representatives and Mr Miller had been present when both decisions were taken.

Central to Mr Miller's argument was the likelihood that the CNAA would shortly give the larger and more experienced polytechnics a licence to validate their own degree courses. If licences were to be granted, it was essential that the academic board was academically respectable, he told Mr Prentice. The previously agreed 20 per cent student representation would be excessive, he said.

But he also stated that "the kind of people likely to come into the polytechnics will be academically more distinguished than hitherto, and hence more able to ensure that proper academic standards are set and maintained, and consequently they will expect an adequate professional academic pesence at the academic board".

It is this implied slur on the competence of the current teaching staff at North London which has annoyed the Association of Teachers in Technical Institutions. Mr Tom Jones, the ATTI's senior liaison officer, said the staff at North London were as academically respectable as the staff at other polytechnics. He regretted that Mr Miller had seen fit to make such a comment.

Although the letter was withdrawn when Mr Miller realized the anger it had created, it was used as the main evidence during the three-and-a-half hour special meeting of the governors which decided to seek his suspension. But it was the meeting of the advisory committee on March 24 which started the moves to oust Mr Miller when a censure resolution drawn up by the chairman, Mr Jack Straw, came up for discussion.

Mr Straw was incensed when he saw what Mr Miller had written to the Education Secretary. The committee had been unanimous in recommending 11 student representatives, Mr Straw said this week. And the director had agreed to the recommendation, he said.

The director's letter sheds a different light on the committee's deliberations. "It is important to understand that in all the long discussions in the JAC which preceded the final recommendation no sound reason for the 20 per cent student representation was ever presented", Mr Miller wrote.

"Indeed, Mr Jack Straw, the chairman, made this quite clear by saying that he simply wanted PNL to 'remain top of the league' of student participation. This position was supported by the other ILEA members and, in the event, prevailed, although I registered my disagreement throughout. (The other PNL members grudgingly went along with the 20 per cent in order to avoid trouble, and for no other reason.)"

Whether the suspension will be put into effect rests with Dr Walter Ross, the chairman of the governors, who is also vice-chairman of the ILEA further and higher education subcommittee. It is thought unlikely he will suspend Mr Miller, not least because of the fear of legal repercussions; wrongful suspension could cost the poly large sums if it was taken to court. Instead, Dr Ross has called for a special meeting of the governors on June 9 to consider the format of an inquiry into the whole business.

It is possible, though, that if enough governors are impatient to resolve the situation, they could meet earlier. Whatever the date, it is unlikely any solution will be found before the CNAA make a special visit to the poly to see if it has managed to pull itself together since the last critical inspection two years ago. The CNAA visit represents a greater threat to the future of the Polytechnic of North London than the row over Mr Miller's letter.

Warwick appeal turned down

A High Court hearing rejected an appeal by the students union of Warwick University this week to serve an injunction on the university to prevent further delays in payment of grant cheques.

The students union presented the university with a writ last week. The High Court hearing, which was held on Tuesday, refused to grant an injunction but gave the union the right to appeal.

Grant cheques have been withheld since the start of the new term two weeks ago when 500 students occupied Senate House, the university's adminstration centre, and the telephone exchange in a protest against rent increases.

The students union claim that the occupation is being used deliberately by the university authorities as an excuse for non-payment of grants.

The university say grants are not being deliberately withheld but that the sit-in has brought administration to a standstill.

Voluntary reply

The Association of Voluntary Aided Schools at their annual meeting last week criticized the "misleading" statement by the Inner London Education Authority that all but four of London's 42 voluntary aided schools had agreed to end selection.

"In many cases", a resolution said, "such an intention is dependent on the outcome of further consultation, and no agreement has yet been reached by a substantial number of governing bodies."

New training councils urged

The regional advisory councils for further education and the area training organizations for teacher training should be replaced urgently by new regional bodies, the Council of Local Education Authorities say in a paper submitted to the Department of Education and Science.

The decision to renew discussion about the future of regional educational bodies suggests that the DES feel they cannot wait any longer for a national decision on the devolution of power.

Two years ago they started a review of regional machinery in the light of the education White Paper's proposals for regional bodies to replace the ATOs and the recognized need to update the role of the RACs. But the question of the devolution of power, plus discussion about the regional planning and coordination of higher education, held up any final decision.

In their proposals CLEA recommend that new bodies should be set up, sticking to the present RAC boundaries.

They should have the job of watching and advising on the coordination of all forms of further and higher education in the public sector, including the induction and in-service training of teachers and advanced further education.

They should not have any financial or executive power; nor would they stand between local and central government. Instead they should become bodies to which local authorities, voluntary bodies, colleges and other institutions would feel compelled to turn for advice.

Polys may be freed from CNAA

Polytechnics might soon be given the chance to award their own degrees in the same way as universities. The Council for National Academic Awards, who control degree courses in all the 30 polytechnics in the country, meet later this month to decide whether to publish a green paper which will pave the way towards academic independence.

Many poly directors are keen to move away from the control of the CNAA. They argue that they have been in the business long enough now to be judged mature enough to devise, approve and award their own degrees. But a change in the CNAA's charter will be needed before the polys can be given academic government.

At the moment the council are only empowered to approve awards. They cannot give the polys the same power but there is talk of a licence system which could cut out the lengthy administrative procedures involved when a polytechnic submits a proposal for a new degree.

Greater power could be given to polytechnic academic boards in giving approval, and they could set up advisory committees, with members from outside the institution, to do much of the council's work.

Discussions on the licence scheme have been held by the Committee of Polytechnic Directors and the CNAA, and the green paper will be the first public announcement.

After describing the various ways their courses are approved—through the CNAA, professional bodies, and central and local government—the directors said the complexity of the arrangements were inhibiting. "There is an elaborate system for approval of courses to be run in polytechnics", the paper said. "It is a very complex and cumbersome procedure which we consider to be much too detailed and an obstacle to the overall development planning of an institution."

Students may face £17,000 sit-in bill

The students union at Lancaster University could be facing a £17,000 bill as a result of their 12-day sit-in at the university last term. It is bound to affect seriously a union whose annual income from capitation comes to about £60,000 and whose officers—even without this blow—have been discussing ways of cutting back on their spending.

The total includes £1,717 for the repairs to University House; £1,775 for expenses incurred by the High Sheriff and 25 bailiffs in evicting the students; £300 in counsel's fees; and an estimated £3,000 to £4,000 in solicitors' fees.

The 28 students disciplined by a special committee of senate lodged their appeal this week. Their letters to the secretary for students' affairs say they are appealing against the tribunal, its procedure, its decisions and its penalties.

On Wednesday, the senate was due to meet to discuss a proposal from the vice-chancellor and pro vice-chancellors that the student representative council should abolish thier own executive and general meeting, and from Professor A. H. Woolrych clamping down on the use of loudhailers on the campus.

Professor Philip Levy, head of the department of psychology, and Dr Ram Singh, lecturer in the department of behaviour in organization, had tabled a motion asking that these hardline items be deferred and asking for a conciliation group of staff and students. On the same day the NUS were organizing their day of action in Lancaster, and the Lancaster students union were due to discuss whether or not to hold another occupation.

Times Higher Education Supplement

Shut-down protest

Huddersfield Polytechnic is to protest to the Department of Education over the proposal to shut down its teacher training department. A statement from the polytechnic this week expresses "great concern" at the proposal, which would mean the dismantling, after five years, of a merger with Oastler College of Education.

DES issue plans to phase out direct grants

Direct grant schools will receive a letter from the Department of Education and Science in the next few days which is expected to ask for a statement of intent by the end of the summer as to their future status.

It is likely to say that any school that is prepared to give a sincere commitment to join the maintained system as a comprehensive will have its grant continued while the actual negotiations take place.

Many of the schools that are likely to opt for the maintained system, particularly the Roman Catholic schools, have outstanding capital debts. These will have to be paid off before the school can be admitted. It is expected that the direct grant regulations might be amended to let the Secretary of State wipe them out by a special grant in each individual case.

Difficulties are likely to arise over the direct grant boarding schools which between them provide places for 10,000 boarders, many of them paid for by local authorities on the grounds of boarding need. It seems to be assumed that most of these schools will go independent.

Earlier this week Mr Donald Lindsay, director of the Independent Schools Information Service, complained that they were being given only four months to plan the phasing out of direct grants—which the Donnison Committee had said would take four years.

Launching a national campaign to save the direct grants, he said that the system needed reform. "No one is going to die in the last ditch to defend the present system". But discussions would take time.

The difficulties involved, for example in coping with children with boarding need or in areas heavily dependent on their direct grants, were considerable.

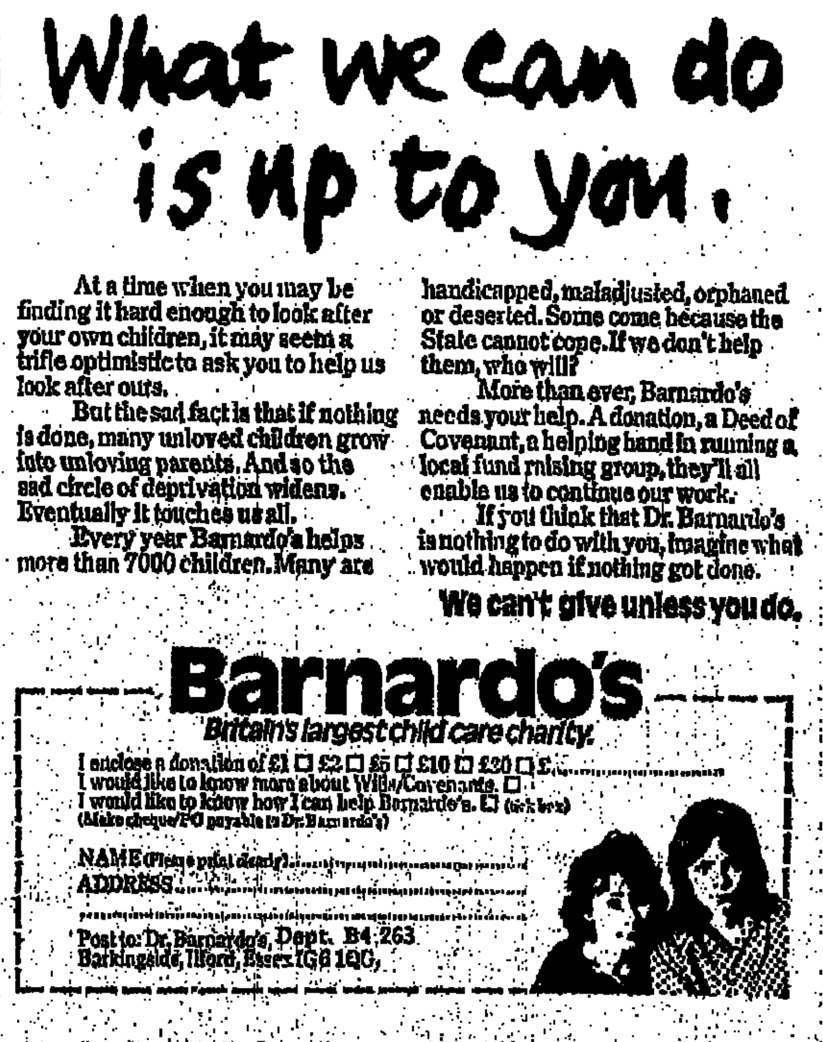
One of the results of abolishing the grant would be a "totally unnecessary increase in the rates" in areas which could not do without their direct grants. The local authority would be forced to continue taking places at the school but would have to pay full independent school fees, he said.

But the increased cost to local authorities may not be all that large. Full fees are likely to rise by about £80 to £100 a year. This may be offset by the fact that local authorities have their own system of means testing grants they make to cover independent school fees.

In areas where the direct grants have traditionally filled the role of local grammar school (particularly in Lancashire), fitting them into the comprehensive system should be fairly straightforward, and contingency plans have already been drawn up. If the schools opt for independence, the local authority is likely to continue paying fees. Previously the authority would have paid the full direct grant fees (slightly lower than independent fees). Under the new arrangement they would pay higher fees but recover some of the money from parents.

It is also possible that some pupils in Catholic schools will be taken away if the schools go in with the maintained system. Mr W. J. H. Robson, headmaster of Bury Grammar School (which is going independent), said at the weekend that they had already started attracting Catholic pupils.

The direct grant campaign, launched by Mr Lindsay, is being organized on a regional basis. Special attention is being paid to Scotland where the grant-aided schools are threatened. The campaign will culminate in a lobby of Parliament in June or July.



What we can do is up to you.

At a time when you may be finding it hard enough to look after your own children, it may seem a trifle optimistic to ask you to help us look after ours.

But the sad fact is that if nothing is done, many unloved children grow into unloving parents. And so the sad circle of deprivation widens. Eventually it touches us all.

Every year Barnardo's helps more than 7000 children. Many are handicapped, maladjusted, orphaned or deserted. Some come because the State cannot cope. If we don't help them, who will?

More than ever, Barnardo's needs your help. A donation, a Deed of Covenant, a helping hand in running a local fund raising group, they'll all enable us to continue our work.

If you think that Dr. Barnardo's is nothing to do with you, imagine what would happen if nothing got done.

We can't give unless you do.

Cement 'a problem for years'

by Mark Vaughan

There are still 131 colleges and schools in England partly or completely closed because they contain high alumina cement concrete, the Department of Education and Science said this week. The total number of maintained educational buildings in England known to have the cement is now 1,228.

A further 485 in the maintained sector have been listed as "possibly containing the cement", but still have to be investigated. The Department of the Environment put the total of all educational buildings, including independent and direct grant schools which contain the material at 1,500.

The Department of the Environment last week sent a circular letter to all local authorities summarizing the findings of a report by the Building Research Establishment which has been investigating the size and complexity of the problem. The BRE report will be published later this month, but in the meantime the DOE considered they should give the authorities some information from the report "without delay".

The DOE said their earlier conclusion that precast prestressed isolated roof beams represented the main potential hazard was confirmed. "If they show, on inspection, presence of both moisture and aggressive chemicals or visible signs of distress as sagging or cracking, remedial measures are required."

The Department said that the risk of failure in floors with spans up to about five metres is small, and their earlier advice that these floors need not be inspected "still holds good".

The DOE circular letter also announced the setting up of a public sector working party to examine the practical and financial implications of the high alumina cement problem.

Mr Tim Brighouse, deputy education office of the Association of County Councils, said: "We will maintain through thick and thin that it is a national mistake in design and that the problem should not be solved through local finance."

The Department of Education and Science revealed for the first time this week that 12 education authorities had obtained loan sanction to pay for the rebuilding of schools affected by the cement. On top of this figure there is a slightly larger number of authorities who have had schemes for remedial work approved in principle.

Leeds remain the education authority with the greatest high alumina cement problem in terms of numbers of disrupted children. At one point last year the city had 12 schools closed completely, although there are now only three. Early on, the city invested in a large number of temporary classrooms which were erected in the grounds of the affected schools.

Leeds' most difficult problem has been the Silver Royd Comprehensive High School for 550 girls. The authority have had to replace the whole of the one-storey block with temporary classrooms at a cost of £250,000 and, according to Mr William Wright, senior assistant education officer, it will involve a major amount of rebuilding work to put the school right again.

The DES said the other l.e.a.s in the "top league" included Lancashire who have probably had more shored-up schools than any other authority, Liverpool, Birmingham, Nottinghamshire, Sefton, Wirral and Knowsley. These l.e.a.s have more schools than others in the top priority category of long, exposed concrete beams, many of which are in "adverse environmental conditions" such as over a swimming pool.

Of the 1,228, a total of 475 have been cleared after preliminary investigation and 478 have been declared safe.

The latest DES figures also show that fewer than 2,000 children in English schools are currently experiencing "shortened days" as a direct result of the crisis, compared with 30,000 at the height of the problem last year.

About 80 out of the 96 English l.e.a.s have educational buildings with high alumina cement, and while the DES say that the majority of them have now got on top of the problem, they admit that schools and colleges will be affected for "some years to come".

A spokesman for the Welsh Office, who have responsibility for education in Wales, said a total of 38 schools and five colleges in the eight Welsh authorities were found to contain the cement last year. The latest position was that only one, the Olchfa comprehensive school in Swansea, had been closed and that four were still partly closed.

The BRE report confirmed that the concrete undergoes a chemical change known as conversion, which is accompanied by loss of strength and reduction of resistance to chemical attack.

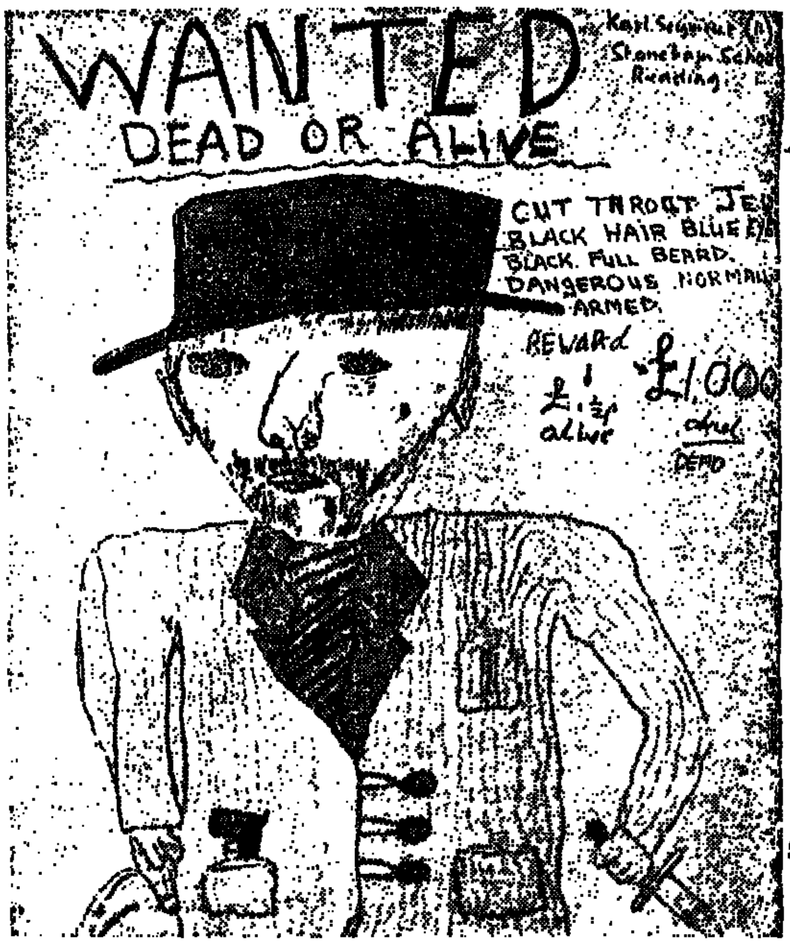
"The higher the temperature during casting of the concrete, and during the life of the building, the more quickly conversion takes place.

"The results show that most high alumina cement concrete in prestressed beams in buildings more than a few years old is highly converted or is likely to become highly converted."

While the BRE found that the strength of the highly converted concrete was substantially less than its initial strength, in most cases the loss was not critical to the safety of the building.

Mr Gerald Kaufman, Under Secretary of State at the DOE, said last week that the total number of buildings in Britain known to contain the cement is about 22,500. When investigations are completed, there may be found to be as many as 50,000. Some 1,500 of the known buildings are schools and colleges, and there are also about 13,000 residential buildings containing 60,000 homes.

Copies of the BRE report are to be sent to local authorities, and a circular letter giving the DOE's recommendations will be issued after the Building Regulations Advisory Committee have considered a report by a special BRAC subcommittee.



The work of one young patient.

When hospital is boring ...

"Hospital is boring sometimes, but only sometimes I wish I was home", wrote one young patient in a Reading hospital. Perhaps the Home and Hospital Teaching Service, whose work is now on show at the Reading Art Gallery, can help to make it less boring.

The service covers six teaching units: four in two hospitals, another for pupils who are recovering at home and a special teaching centre both for patients who are not yet ready for school, but well enough to be out of hospital and for pregnant schoolgirls. More than 1,000 children were taught last year.

Mrs Kathleen Hurley, who organizes the team of six teachers, a nursery assistant and a panel of 11 specialists, claims that the service is unique. Patients do not just do art and play therapy when they are well enough, but follow school courses which they are missing.

Too many fail city's 11-plus

Twenty places may be left vacant in a Birmingham grammar school next year in spite of the city's acute shortage of secondary places. Only 100 of the 250 applicants for Handsworth Grammar School passed the city's optional 11-plus examination.

This is likely to provide welcome ammunition for Birmingham's Labour-dominated Education Committee who have been pressing the governors of the six voluntary grammar schools in the city to go comprehensive. The county secondary schools and the church grammar schools have already done so.

The shortage of comprehensive places is particularly serious in the Handsworth area. The Labour leaders are likely to see the 11-plus results as an indication that an increasing number of the brighter children have decided to choose comprehensive.

News of the unfilled places at Handsworth spread quickly this week among parents of children who had failed to get into other grammar schools, some of which demand a higher 11-plus mark than Handsworth. They were told by the education department that they would have to wait and see whether the education committee, which has until now strictly enforced a rule that 11-plus entrants can only be considered for the school they opted for, will be able to find some way of letting 20 of them in.

But Miss Sheila Wright, Birmingham Education Committee chairman, said later: "If there are children who are qualified to the necessary standards, we will see that the places are filled."

Dons to strike over pay

University dons are to strike on Tuesday in support of a pay claim. The protest, called by the Association of University Teachers, is believed to be the first of its kind in Britain.

Local associations of the AUT will hold day or half-day strikes and mass meetings. They will also lobby MPs. University staffs are angry at the breakdown of talks over an 18 per cent salary claim backdated to October.

The claim was designed to keep lecturers' salaries in line with the pay of other public servants and was a "topping up" exercise after last year's seven per cent rise. The Government have rejected it because it breaks the 12-month rule in the social contract.

The AUT asked for arbitration, but the Government refused.

Sixth-form centres to help small A level groups

The Inner London Education Authority are to use sixth-form centres to help schools with small A level groups. Last week their schools sub-committee agreed to set up the first of them for the 17 secondary schools in the Tower Hamlets and City of London area in September next year.

Sixth formers and staff will remain in their own schools. When only a few elect for a particular sixth-form course they could be collected together at the centre.

The ILEA see this as one answer to falling school rolls and small sixth forms in Inner London with advantages over sixth-form colleges. Staff who teach advanced courses are available to teach throughout the 11 to 18 range in the school and no change of school is necessary for pupils.

The Tower Hamlets centre is to be established in what is now George Green's School, Poplar, after that moves to a new community school on the Isle of Dogs. The centre will have a full-time coordinator of studies, and an advisory council of ILEA officers and representatives from each school.

Mr Harvey Hinds, chairman of the schools sub-committee, said this was part of a wider trend in Inner London towards sixth-form collaboration. "It is not just a question of using resources more economically. The centre will bring positive educational advantages and create opportunities at present not available to all children in the area."

The ILEA claim "overwhelming support" for the idea from staff in the 17 schools.

An "ardent supporter" is Mrs E. H. Dunford, headmistress of Central Foundation girls' grammar school. More working class girls would leave school altogether if they had to go on to a sixth-form college, she said.

"There was a stage when we offered 20 subjects at A level but as many as 10 were taken only by two or three girls." This was "shockingly wasteful" of the best teachers and the lower school was "pinched" because of the "lavish teaching" in the sixth.

Mr James Learmonth, head of George Green's, thought it a very sensible use of manpower, especially for minority subjects like music. There were practical questions and timetabling differences to be resolved. What, he wondered, would be the number for a viable A level group to remain in school?

Mr Peter Andrews, head of Langdon Park School, also wondered about the criterion for viability. In an area of disadvantaged children, many of whom had to be supported through social and emotional difficulties to reach the sixth form at all, the idea of being sent off somewhere else to study would be abhorrent to some of them.

Mr James Taylor, head of Stepney Green Comprehensive, was "totally and absolutely" against it. Good staff would be cheated of opportunities to do A level work and would leave for schools where they could get it.

Schools in the area were not producing A levels, not because they did not have the manpower, but because they were not running good O level courses. The question was not one of viable sixth forms but "viable" fifth forms.

The sixth-form centre was "a stupid waste of money". What the authority needed was viable comprehensive schools.

"There are schools masquerading as comprehensives that parents would not even walk their dogs past."

Mr A. J. Davenport, head of St Paul's Way School, is a firm centre supporter. Small groups, he said, were often educationally unsound especially in such things as English where pupils learnt a lot from the "rub-off" between each other. The centre meant the sixth form could offer the subjects pupils wanted, an important consideration when it was in competition with very good jobs waiting for the well qualified fifth former in the nearby city. His staff were enthusiastic about it.

Banbury bright do well unstreamed

by Philip Venning

Bright 11 to 13-year-olds in unstreamed classes do no worse academically than those in streamed classes, but they make friends from a wider social background.

This is among the conclusions of a three-year study into mixed ability teaching at Banbury School, Oxfordshire, which was sponsored by the Department of Education and Science. A full report is likely to be published later this year.

Banbury School, the largest comprehensive in the country, is a federation of schools attended by all but a handful of pupils in the area. Because of their wide social and academic backgrounds, it was judged to be specially suitable for research into mixed ability teaching.

About 2,000 11 to 13-year-olds were divided into streamed and unstreamed classes, and the academic performance of each group was compared.

Mr John Sayer, the head, said the research showed that bright children did just as well in unstreamed classes, while less able children in the same classes improved their performance in reading and verbal reasoning tests.

Children's primary schools had a big influence on both streamed and unstreamed classes, though they would have to do more research to find out if this lasted further up the school.

"The extent to which these earlier influences remain dominant in the secondary school and in the separate grouping systems provides a commentary on the success of the educational machine in providing equality of opportunity for pupils of comparable ability but different backgrounds."

The children's academic results also depended to a large extent on how they got on with their teachers. Mr David Newbold, the DES research officer in charge of the project, said that because more than 120 teachers were involved, the effects of individual variations between teachers would be greatly reduced.

"It was not intended that all the mixed ability teachers should be wildly enthusiastic pioneers of that system, or that streamed teachers should be unduly traditional or reactionary. The teachers in each system are representative of an average cross-section, some of whom have their own personal preference for one system, some for another."

Only a few with a positive antipathy to one sort of grouping were removed from it.

In spite of the statistical results on academic performance in streamed and unstreamed classes, some teachers were sceptical about whether they would remain true as the children moved up the school. While most recognized the social value of mixed ability grouping, some, notably French teachers and to a lesser extent maths teachers, thought there were disadvantages in mixed ability teaching which would emerge in due course.

The children in the two groups were also asked about their friendships. These were analysed according to verbal reasoning ability, primary school, and social class. This revealed that children in mixed ability classes chose their friends from a wider social background than those in streamed classes.

But Mr Sayer says that the tests used were only appropriate to 11 to 13-year-olds. "It is to be expected that a wider range of influence will affect friendship patterns in the later teens." New measures will be required to measure social mixing as the children get older.

The present research project comes to an end this year, and Mr Sayer is particularly anxious that it should be renewed. Most of the findings needed follow-up and confirmation.

Mr Newbold agrees. "The task of deciding objectives and policies in secondary education is increasingly tough, and more objective evidence—from Banbury and elsewhere—is needed to back up the individual decisions which schools have to make."

He is worried that people will be tempted to make generalizations on the basis of their findings so far. "Unless the objectives which have led schools to formulate their priorities, and hence their organizations, are clearly understood, then quantitative comparisons may not be meaningful or valid."

The DES have not yet decided whether to renew the grant.

Earlier this year Dr Eric Briault, education officer of the Inner London Education Authority, asked London inspectors to prepare a report on mixed ability teaching. This is not a research project, but its findings, due to be published later this year, may provide some comparisons with the Banbury results.

Convert to BEd courses, universities told

University diploma courses for serving teachers should be converted to BEd courses, the Universities Council for the Education of Teachers says this week.

The diplomas, which are offered to teachers who want a university award but who cannot undertake a gruelling part-time degree, have been very successful, says a council report. But more degree courses are needed and it will be possible to convert some diploma courses in many universities into BEd awards.

"It is frequently asserted that many existing diploma courses in education are just as demanding in scope and standard as a first degree. Where this really is so, both in scope and in standards, it is difficult to see why the conversion should not be effected forthwith.

"Where they are not strictly comparable, thought should be given to the changes required to turn an existing diploma into a worthwhile in-service degree.

"The conversion from diplomas to degrees should be rapid rather than gradual, if provision is going to be commensurate with need and demand, though not every university will feel itself under an obligation to make the change."

A few universities have called their in-service degrees for teachers a Bachelor of Philosophy or BPhil (Education). This title might be thought "uncomfortable" because it has an implication that some research has been done, the report says. "It is not a well established member of the family of first degrees, as the BEd now is, and may indeed be thought simply unnecessary."

Varied forms of degree courses are proposed by the council. Some teachers might find it easier to obtain release from school for a term rather than a year. The rest of the course could be done part time. Another pattern might include day release with, perhaps, four weeks of full-time study.

"Courses of these kinds might well cover the ground in five terms or two years, rather than the three years which is more commonly the norm for a completely part-time degree course."

Students pay more than dons

Glasgow students will be paying £7 a week each next session to share a room with three beds while professors pay only £6 a week for a house with half-a-dozen rooms, said Mr John Bell, president of the Students' Representative Council, at Glasgow University, last week.

Mr Bell, who was speaking during the installation of Mr Arthur Montford, Scottish Television sports commentator, as rector of the university, said that students living in a catering hall of residence could expect to pay over £15 a week next session on the present level of grant, this represented almost 80 per cent of their income. Only students whose income was financed or heavily subsidised by wealthy parents would be able to live in such establishments next year.

RSLA brings big jump in CSE entries

A massive jump in entries for CSE and an increase in Mode 3 schemes greeted the raising of the school leaving age last year. At the same time, the proportion of Grade 5 and ungraded candidates and those absent from the examination increased, according to a survey of CSE board figures by Mr M. D. Targett, a teacher from Willinck Comprehensive School, near Reading.

In Education in Science, the Association for Science Education's journal, Mr Targett says that little change took place between 1972 and 1973 but RSLA made a great deal of difference.

A typical board was 88 per cent up on entries for CSE English, 38 per cent for mathematics, 53 per cent for general science and 46 per cent for biology. Entries for physics and chemistry rose by 29 and 23 per cent and for human biology by 58 per cent.

The increase in Mode 3 entries for English and mathematics was up from nearly one in 40 to one in 14, though the proportions taking Mode 3 physics and biology virtually halved. There was no Mode 3 general science in previous years but one in 25 of last years entries were in this mode, and Mode 3 entries for human biology doubled.

In 1972 and 1973 86 per cent of the candidates for English got a Grade 4 or better but in 1974 this figure dropped to 79 per cent. The drop for mathematics was from 66 to 58 per cent and for biology from 83 to 68 per cent. The percentage getting Grade 4 or better for general science dropped from 82 to 71.

The total entries for another board were up by nearly a third while the number of examination absences had trebled from just over 2,000 in 1973 to nearly 6,000 in 1974. In addition, 25,402 candidates were ungraded.

Duty to save 'victims of moral pollution'

by Stephen Cohen

The Festival of Light are planning to set up a hostel for "victims of moral pollution". Pornography addicts, young male homosexuals and "others involved in erotica" will be treated by a combination of prayer and craft work.

Teenagers and young people who drift to London are believed to be in grave moral danger and the Festival of Light see it as their duty to attempt to save them.

Mr Raymond Johnston, director of the festival, said last week there were many completely disoriented young people in London with nowhere to go and nothing to do.

"Drug addicts and alcoholics have had a distinct appeal to the Christian public. There are now various types of help they can get. But there is a broader group of people who have been at the mercy of materialism and are utterly confused, morally and spiritually.

Many of the young people the festival hope to help will be connected with the entertainment world, either as participants or customers. Some youngsters were "hooked" on erotic productions such as Oh! Calcutta.

The idea for the hostel came from Mr Ernest Shackleton, of Swindon, Wiltshire, who, with a Mr Geoffrey Percival drew up a paper outlining the hostel's aims. It was hoped to open the centre in Mayfair, "the very heart of the enemy's country", but costs of up to £150,000 put paid to that idea.

The project team have since been looking at a disused Salvation Army hostel in Denmark Hill, London, and part of the former East Anglia School for Girls at Bury St Edmunds, in Suffolk.

An appeal would have to be launched among the festival's supporters to finance the operation; a figure of £3,000 an inmate has been mentioned. Running costs would be defrayed by the residents who would be expected to draw sick benefit or social security payments and hand them over to the wardens.

The recovery programme envisaged divides the residents' time between spiritual activities and manual labour. There will be morning and evening prayers, practical spiritual instruction and Bible study, some of which will be compulsory, and obligatory craft work.

The range of crafts includes simple basketry, steel seating, weaving tartan knee rugs, lamp shade making, printing and picture framing.

Arranging for the residents' free time has caused some difficulty. "Television is a great problem", says the background paper.

Music and literature are to be part of the programme. "Opportunities would be given to introduce some residents to the delights of good reading — as opposed, for instance, to pornography. Poetry, especially, might do wonders."

Admissions would be after interview and screening. Some Christian psychiatrists had offered to help. No man would be admitted unless there was every reason to believe that he was anxious to overcome his problem.

Candidates would be referred by social workers or obtained by street contacts. Mr Johnston emphasized that the project was at a tentative stage, and that if it was going to materialize it would need the financial support of many people.

The background paper concludes with an appeal for the "prayerful interest and practical help of all Christians who feel burdened for the healing of men and women and, indeed, boys and girls, from the ravages of the widespread propaganda for sexual vice and commercialized depravity which are so prevalent today."

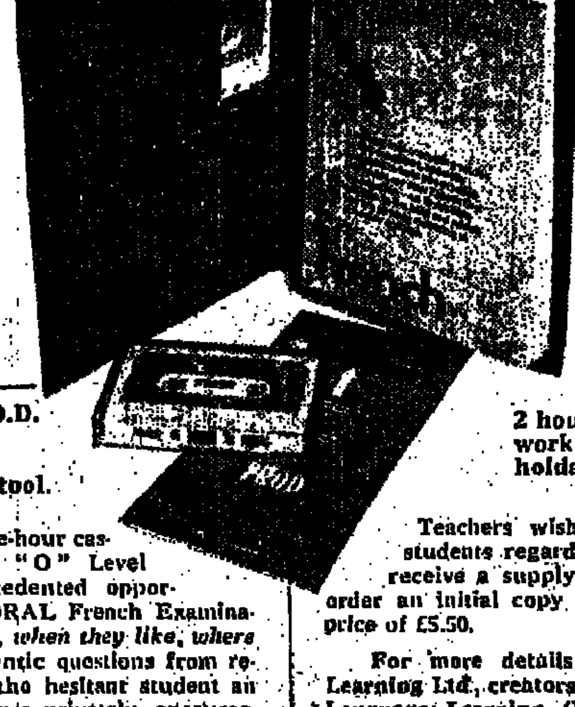
For a PASS in FRENCH . . . all they need is a P.R.O.D. — a unique answer to the need for Practice & Revision in Oral & Dictation

AN OPPORTUNITY FOR STUDENTS TO :—

- ✱ Hear and distinguish between the 33 most frequently misheard words (on, en; quand, quant etc.)
- ✱ Practise 26 typical oral questions – about your life, home and family (with sample answers).
- ✱ Set yourself 5 typical examination dictées – then check your answers to see how you got on.
- ✱ Work through 3 standard GCE O-level comprehension tests (with answers supplied).
- ✱ Follow the 5 reading passages to build up your fluency and improve your accent.
- ✱ 4 translation tests – with recommended translations.
- ✱ 3 pictorial composition exercises with sentences for you to complete.

HOW THE COURSE IS COMPILED :—

- ✱ 117-page workbook contains complete printed text of recorded course.
- ✱ Ample feint-ruled blank pages for you to write in your answers and make helpful notes.
- ✱ Entire course fits snugly into handy compact holdall (measuring only 9½" × 6½") – even your pen is included.
- ✱ Ingenious red filter card reveals correct answers when placed over page.
- ✱ All you need is a compact cassette player or recorder – any model will do.



Teachers welcome P.R.O.D. as a spur to higher pass rates—and as an individualized teaching tool.

On two expertly spoken one-hour cassettes, P.R.O.D. presents "O" Level students with an unprecedented opportunity to rehearse their ORAL French Examination—as often as they like, when they like, where they like. Based on authentic questions from recent test papers, it gives the hesitant student an ideal opportunity to rehearse privately, encouraging him to respond to voices and accents different from those of his usual teacher.

The course opens with a band of commonly mis-heard words and syllables, clearly illustrating the distinction between them. This is followed by dictée, typical "interview" questions, oral comprehension, reading passages, translation tests and pictorial composition exercises. The complete text of the cassettes is contained in a spiral-bound workbook with, where appropriate, the correct versions skilfully concealed by an over-printed colour screen (until viewed through the special filter card supplied). Additional workbooks are available for schools' use.

It is believed that many parents will also see in P.R.O.D. a means of providing vital, additional coaching in the crucial last month.

COMPLETE COURSE:

Two full-length, double-sided cassettes—

2 hours' recording. Also 117-page workbook, masking device, handy holdall and pen.

Teachers wishing to advise parents or students regarding P.R.O.D. are invited to receive a supply of brochures, and also to order an initial copy at the special introductory price of £5.50.

For more details please contact World of Learning Ltd., creators of Programmed Instruction Language Learning (P.I.L.L.), 359 Upper Richmond Road West, London SW14 8QN (telephone: 01-878 4314).

"I have examined the P.R.O.D. course closely and I am confident that it will prove to be a very valuable aid to teachers. Now we shall be able to say to a student: go home and polish up your dictation or do a little more work on comprehension. I also think it would be good for the student to learn to respond to different voices, and I have no doubt that the course will help to dispel anxiety about examinations."

G. Leon-Smith, M.A., Headmaster,
Headmaster of a London comprehensive

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER TO SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

The normal price of P.R.O.D. is £9.95 (less educational discount). However, one initial copy is available per establishment at the introductory price of only £5.50. Please order from World of Learning.

‘Therapy’ classes make a hit

by Jane Feinmann

Two Essex comprehensives have given third year pupils group sensitivity classes during the year, to help them to gain a deeper awareness of themselves, their relationships with others and learn to deal with the problems of adolescence.

The courses have been so successful that one of the heads, Mr Peter White, of Tabor High School, Braintree, says: “If I had to choose between, say, geography and this course, I would drop geography.”

They have been financed to the tune of £16,000 by Mr Michael Lewis, a company director with a part-time interest in psychiatry as chairman of the Bowden House Clinic, a private mental hospital next door to Harrow School. The money covered research and the salaries of one teacher at each school. Mr Lewis believes in the “grave necessity” of such courses.

“There is tremendous insecurity in the adolescent years. It is often the most traumatic part of life. But all the stress at school is on mental agility. Nobody teaches anything about mental fitness.”

With the help of Dr Glyn Davies, medical director at Bowden House, Mr Lewis devised the skeleton of the “human relations” course. “People are scared of the word psychology.”

He met some resentment and suspicion in education circles but was able to “sell the idea” to the Braintree heads, both of whom were already running progressive counselling schemes in their schools with teachers who had undergone a course of in-service training at the the Tavistock Institute.

Mr Lewis employed a research officer, Miss Jenny Laishley, who devised a detailed syllabus. She found that many teachers were working on the same idea. She worked with them to compile supporting material which, she hopes, will soon be published.

At the Alec Hunter School the course was built onto the vocational guidance class, which had already touched on personal problems in a small way.

Mrs Eve Thornton, counsellor and English teacher, was able to give nearly all her time to human relations last year because her salary was paid by Mr Lewis. A temporary teacher took her regular classes.

This year, the school is continuing the course without the extra money, so her classes are about twice the size, and her timetable rather more hectic.

“We have a set course, but I let the lessons run on if the children are responding well. I shut them up if they start talking about personal family situations.

“The classroom makes a great difference to how a session goes. We once had to hold it in the potting shed, which was a great success, probably because it was so informal. It works best in a large room. The children don't feel cramped and can sit round in a circle.”

Making a start is often the great problem. Mrs Thornton says it varies from blank faces on Monday morning to a class full of energy and ideas who only need a challenging question or two to launch into stormy debate.

Last Tuesday the subject was “emotions”. “Let's talk about excitement”, said Mrs Thornton, and the 30-odd children, sitting on desks, chairs and tables at the front of the class, solemnly wrote down “excitement” in their exercise books and underlined it.

Nobody was interested in “excitement” and, after some prodding, Mrs Thornton moved on to “worry” which was much more popular. Hands shot up as she moved around the familiar ground of everyday situations—a mother worrying when her daughter was not home by 10.30 pm; a teenager worrying about his spotty face.

The girls sat, heads bowed over notebooks, scribbling furiously. A boy put his hand up at every opportunity. But the atmosphere was more relaxed than usual in a classroom.

Marina Carter and Andrew Maddocks, 14-year-olds who took the course last year, enjoyed it because it was the only lesson in which the teacher was “interested in what you felt”.

“In other lessons, you just switch on when you go in and switch off when you go out. But you think about human relations all the time. It makes you think about yourself in a different way”, said Andrew.

Marina thought that relationships between children had improved. “You can say anything to anybody and know that they'll understand what you mean. You never talked to boys, for instance, because you were scared they'd laugh at you. I think it has made us more mature.”

Both heads said that the extra resources available were a significant factor in the success of the project.

“We've had several times the amount of money pumped into this course than normal. And more money means smaller classes and better teaching—it would in any subject”, said Mr White. “But we are using the scheme because we believe it is important and not because somebody else is paying for it.”

The future of Mr Lewis's project remains uncertain, now that he is withdrawing his support. The Alec Hunter School is retaining the course next year and is considering extending it into the fifth and sixth forms.

The Tabor High School is carrying on with part of the course, but they say they have not the resources to continue in full.

Mr Lewis believes that something like the human relations project should be adopted nationally and says the results of last year's work is evidence enough to prove his case.

Local authorities would have to pay little more than an extra teacher's salary now that the groundwork in research and producing materials has been effected.

“It is the concept that is important. Once a head decides to devote time and energy to a course like this, a great deal can be achieved with no additional resources.”

Cleaners and cooks to be governors?

A city's education authority are being asked to allow non-teaching members of staff on to school governing bodies.

The idea comes from Mr Derek Webster, chairman of Newcastle upon Tyne education committee. He hopes cleaners, caretakers, cooks and secretaries will be elected as school governors this summer.

Mr Webster said: “I see it as a logical step in the ruling Labour group's programme of democratization within city schools and colleges. Non-teaching staff often have a completely different view of the school which should not be overlooked when important decisions are being made.”

Officials of the area's National Union of Public Employees agree. Mr Rodney Bickerstaffe, the divisional officer, is delighted that his NUPE members may have a governing voice in the activities of their schools. The education authority have, in his view, taken a positive step towards being a one-status employer.

But, Mr Bill Harding, leader of the Conservative group on the council, reacted angrily: “The major object of governing bodies is to consider educational matters. People are brought in because of their educational backgrounds. The new proposal is just debasing the idea.”

Newcastle already give partial representation on governing bodies to teachers. But there is a condition that they must withdraw from the board when certain items are being discussed. In appointing non-teaching governors, Mr Webster will also recommend full status for teachers.

L.e.a. to take on 10 more home visitors

Waltham Forest are to appoint a dozen of the educational home visitors recommended in the Bullock report, Dr A. R. Mutter, assistant education officer for the outer London borough, told a conference for educational visitors in Coventry last week that they wanted to increase the three visitors they now have to 12 or 13 by next September as part of their nursery expansion programme.

“We are heavily committed to educational visiting”, he said. “Nursery expansion is no use unless we sell the school to the community—unless we bring mothers into schools and involve them.”

The purpose of educational visiting is to help parents to fulfill their role in a child's preschool educational and linguistic development. In many cases this goes beyond simply encouraging parents to play and talk with their children. Visitors often offer more general support in a family's social or material difficulties.

Waltham Forest is an example of what the conference's convenor, Mr Geoff Poulton, called the “tremendous growth” of home visiting in the past year. Mr Poulton was director of the West Riding EPA Project which included the educational visitor scheme commended by the Bullock committee. Since then he has tried to get various schemes to share problems and ideas.

In a Liverpool scheme called “Home Link” and another called “Home Start” in Leicester, mothers are being trained to visit other mothers, adding another dimension to the wide spectrum of ideas behind home visiting schemes.

Some visitors believe this should be done by teachers. The visitor should interpret and open up the school to the parents of each new intake, they say.

“Mothers value having a person who knows about child development to talk to,” said Jean Costerton, from ILEA, which has a pilot project running in Deptford.

Mrs Lin Poulton, has been visiting mothers in their homes, launderettes and working people's clubs as part of her work with Southampton University department of extra mural studies, encouraging various self-help mothers groups. She had no expertise to offer these parents, she said. She had to learn from them what they needed and how they coped with stress of such things as depression or single motherhood.

Mrs Joan Jones, director of Birmingham's Priority Playgroups, a voluntary parent support group with five visitors, called for a home visitors lobby. Finance runs out in a few months time in an area of high rise flats and high attempted suicide rates.

Who should the home visitor be visiting? While some wanted scarce visitors to concentrate where the needs were greatest in the tradition of compensatory intervention, others wanted a broad service for all mothers with young children without any stigma of deprivation being attached to home visits.

Clearly, there was no single pattern for home visitors. Though they shared many aims, perhaps it was this diversity that made them decide against forming a national association of home visitors, but they agreed to meet again next term.

‘Madness’, says Lord Butler

Lord Butler, Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, and architect of the 1944 Education Act, accused the Government this week of “absolute madness” in planning to close 30 colleges of education.

Lord Butler, who said he would be raising the issue of college closures in the House of Lords, has written to Mr Prentice, Secretary of State for Education, supporting Darlington College of Education's case to remain open.

Darlington, a 103-year-old college with a strong reputation in nursery education, is the last remaining college of the British and Foreign School Society, which pioneered teacher training in Britain.

Lord Butler, a past president of the society said he disagreed with the Government's projections that there would be too many teachers. The final result could be a shortage of qualified teachers.

‘Stop cheating’ teachers told

Hundreds of teachers have been told to stop “cheating” over free school meals.

Mr Nathan Harris, chairman of Leicestershire education committee, claims many teachers in his authority are taking advantage of the 1968 agreement on school meals and obtaining free lunches even though they are not actually supervising pupils.

Now Leicestershire are planning to tighten up the regulations. They estimate they can save £50,000, and they intend to spend the money on employing more teachers.

Mr Harris said flagrant breaches in the rules could no longer be tolerated. “We have discovered that in some of our high schools between 80 and 100 teachers are waltzing into the dining room and eating free school meals without playing any part in supervising the pupils. Sometimes they actually wait until the children have left before lunching themselves.

Under the 1968 agreement it is only teachers who are supervising children who are entitled to free dinners. And you don't need 80 teachers all doing dinner duty at the same time. “We are not condemning our teachers and we appreciate that this is a perk which has grown up over the years. We would like to be able to give all teachers free dinners regardless but we cannot afford to do so in the present economic circumstances.”

Mr Harris said it would be left up to individual schools to take action. He felt sure they would cooperate. But the sums spent on free meals for teachers would be carefully monitored. If there were signs that money was not being saved, a strong line would have to be taken.

Mrs Betty Coates of the National Union of Teachers said she doubted if £50,000 could be saved by cutting down on free meals for teachers.

“Under the 1968 agreement, teachers are entitled to free dinners if they are with the children, regardless of whether they are called on to do more than sit down and eat. The very presence of teachers has an effect on the discipline and general behaviour of pupils. All teachers cooperate in the collection of dinner money and the marking of dinner registers.”

Expenses paid

Essex have set aside £2.50 for each teacher to pay expenses for evening meetings with parents. The council are also to press for a national agreement on teachers' expenses.

Passion and politics hot up Dyfed's bilingual battle

Apart from the seven overt rebels against Mr Prentice's comprehensive policy, a sizable number of l.e.a.s have been unable or unwilling to give any firm date for going fully comprehensive. Dyfed is one of them, but not because they are dragging their feet on the selection issue. The problem is rather more complicated there. NED THOMAS reports.

Dyfed wants to reorganize along comprehensive lines and it is giving priority in building to its secondary schools, but after last week's announcement by the Welsh Office of capital allocation for building its plans seem to be receding into the future.

During 1975/6 Dyfed must stretch £182,000 to cover all primary and secondary building, as well as minor works at special schools. This compares with a estimated £5m needed for the completion of the seven outstanding schemes of secondary reorganization.

Secondary reorganization in Dyfed has its passions, politics, history and administrative complexities, but these can only be understood inside the very idiosyncratic context of Dyfed itself, and certainly do not reflect an all-British, or even an all-Wales pattern.

Some idea of the political variation and volatility of the area can be gathered from the fact that three of the four parliamentary constituencies are held marginally—Cardiganshire by Liberals from Labour, Carmarthenshire by Plaid Cymru from Labour, Pembrokeshire by Conservatives from Labour. Only Llanelli remains a solidly Labour seat.

In local-government terms Dyfed has a majority of independents who lead Labour by a head, but are not to be characterized as covert conservatives.

The importance of this political background lies in the devious undercurrents it produces rather than in any overt stances of confrontation over the comprehensive principle. Pembrokeshire Tories are not Buckinghamshire Tories and there is no great save-the-grammar-schools campaign. On the other hand, Carmarthenshire Socialism is not Camden Socialism, and old Carmarthenshire (including Llanelli) came into Dyfed with only 33 per cent of its children at comprehensive schools in spite of Labour-controlled councils, while Pembrokeshire had 46 per cent in comprehensive schools and Cardiganshire (run by independents, many of them de facto Liberals and Plaid Cymru) 92 per cent.

In their answer to the TES survey on comprehensive reorganization (March 21) Dyfed said that 35 per cent of all their secondary age children were in comprehensive schools and claimed that nobody sat a selective examination.

In fact, the 11-plus persists in the seven unreorganized areas in the form of tests plus headmasters' reports. Probably from 30 to 40 per cent of the children are in grammar schools in these areas, in line with Welsh tradition. This is a higher percentage than in most selective areas, which is another reason why selection is a less contentious issue here than language.

Yet no one can say that education is apolitical in Dyfed when it is generally thought that Elystan Morgan's opposition (or last-minute conversion) to the coming of a bilingual comprehensive in Aberystwyth cost him and Labour the Cardiganshire seat—not by loss of Labour votes, but by switch of Plaid votes to the Liberal second runner, a man who sends his children to the bilingual comprehensive.

Before pursuing the bilingual schools question and the way it meshes with secondary reorganization, it is important to remember the linguistic complexity of Dyfed. South Pembrokeshire was settled by the Normans and remains a "little England beyond Wales", a distinctive culture of its own, feeling the beginnings of disturbance by the first Welsh nursery classes, more Welsh broadcasting, road signs and so on.

The rest of Dyfed has a high proportion of Welsh speakers, but there is great variation in intensity between town and country and in the level of consciousness about Welsh. The last census showed that industrial Welsh-speaking Carmarthenshire has some of the highest figures for people who speak but do not read or write Welsh.

Few Welsh books and periodicals circulate in these areas, in marked contrast to Cardiganshire, where there is an active cultural life in Welsh, and where, although the proportion of Welsh-speaking children in the primary schools had fallen to 47 per cent at the last count, the total absolute number grew between 1967 and 1973 by some 700.

The figures for Cardiganshire are available because the education committee there collected them and attempted a policy that took account of the language situation. Carmarthenshire, it seems, let things drift, confident that they were a good Welsh-speaking county, just as they kept putting off secondary reorganization, confident that they were a good Labour-controlled council.

Although the difficulties which Dyfed now faces have been compounded by having to plan secondary reorganization so soon after local government reorganization, by lack of money, by the large geographical area—and the psychological distance between councillors which this sometimes creates—there is no doubt that a prime cause of Dyfed's troubles was the educational conservatism and laissez-faire attitude of Carmarthenshire Education Committee in the past.

Dyfed is now having to work fast, but there are a lot of people to consult in a complex situation, and the Welsh Office has agreed to give them the extension of time that they need. The Welsh Office's version of Mr Prentice's Circular 4/74 asked local authorities to take account of differing linguistic situations, and of parents' wishes in this aspect of education.

This was a gentle nudge in the direction of bilingual schools where the demand arose. It has certainly arisen in Dyfed where eight parents' action groups who have been campaigning actively for bilingual education, came together at Carmarthen on April 19 for a combined teach-in.

These parents are in a hurry. They usually have children at primary school, and they want a secondary school that teaches a good half of the subjects through Welsh to be there by the time their children are 11. They have seen bilingual schools grow and prosper in the overwhelmingly English-speaking areas of Glamorgan and North-East Wales, and they ask why not in their area. Indeed there is something ridiculous in a situation where, as a general rule it can be said that the more Welsh-speaking the community you live in, the less is the chance of your child being able to get a secondary education substantially in Welsh.

The ideal solution is the establishment of a bilingual school, that is to say, one which teaches all children, whatever their linguistic home background, some of their subjects through Welsh and others through English. Welsh-medium "streams" in English schools have not been found to be satisfactory, and there is no reason to think that English "streams" in Welsh schools would be any better.

As it happens, the establishment of bilingual schools dovetails quite nicely with secondary reorganization in the towns, especially since Dyfed has set its face against schools of more than 1,500 pupils.

In Aberystwyth, which went comprehensive as a kind of last act by Cardiganshire Education Committee, one grammar and one secondary modern were turned into one bilingual and one English-medium comprehensive. The consultative document for Llanelli, which looks like going through, offers one bilingual comprehensive 11 to 18 as part of a complicated package involving 11 to 18, 11 to 16 schools and a sixth-form college.

The principle of a bilingual school has also been approved for Carmarthen town where it would co-exist with two English-medium schools. All three schools would be under 1,000 in size.

One of the difficulties with bilingual schools is forecasting. Not all Welsh-speakers will commit themselves to these schools in advance, but experience has shown that once they are established, they grow. Surveys of parents' wishes are thus essential if a start is to be made at all but inadequate as a long-term guide.

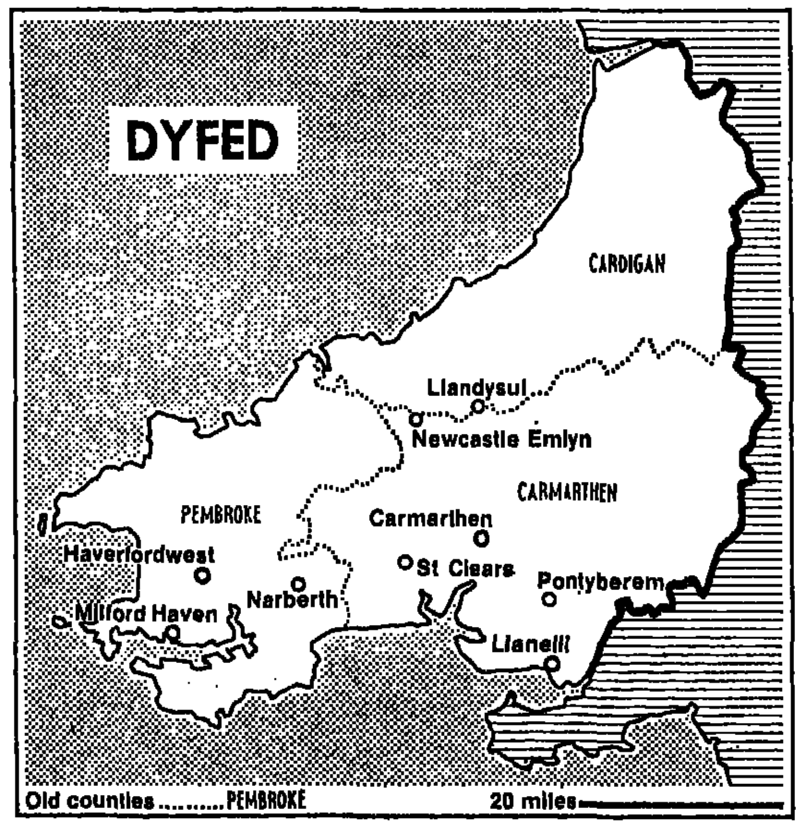
A survey is currently being conducted in the Gwendraeth Valley of Carmarthenshire which could result in one bilingual and one or two other comprehensive schools, while it has been decided to conduct a similar inquiry in the Llandysul/Newcastle Emlyn area which is the one case of a Welsh-speaking rural area with an extant grammar/secondary modern division.

In these areas a parents' action group has conducted its own survey and claims that while 70-75 per cent of primary school children speak Welsh, the proportion of their parents wanting bilingual education varies by primary school catchment area between 69 per cent and 95 per cent.

If this is, indeed, the case then Dyfed may face an unprecedented situation, where logic and statistics point to the establishment of two adjacent bilingual comprehensives, making it necessary for a few children to be bussed right outside the catchment area. This has been happening to Welsh-speaking minorities in Glamorganshire for years, of course, but to ask English-speakers to take a bus outside the catchment area is a different matter in Welsh political conditions.

When Dyfed completes its secondary reorganization in the seven areas outstanding, the chances are that it will have four or five bilingual comprehensive schools, mainly in towns. The rural and most Welsh areas will still have traditional schools, long-standing de facto comprehensives, teaching largely through English.

But many parents in these catchment areas will also be in reach now of a bilingual school which they have a right to opt for. This is the next problem looming on Dyfed's not distant horizon. It could have been avoided had the education committee gone for a total plan to take in both linguistic and comprehensive reorganization over the whole area. The sad thing is that this part of the country should have woken up to the need for reorganization at the very time when it cannot get the money.



Practical maths and physics

The Royal Society and the Council of Engineering Institutions have set up a working party to study how O level syllabuses develop the practical side of maths and physics.

The working party was set up by the newly formed joint education committee of the two bodies, and will look at ways of introducing a more practical element to school science. This, they hope, will encourage a flow of school leavers into engineering.

Brent deny discrimination

Allegations that the London borough of Brent are discriminating against Ugandan Asian students by not giving them grants were denied this week by Mr Len Snow, chairman of Brent education committee.

The borough were criticized for refusing to change a rule that newcomers must have lived in Britain for three years before qualifying for a grant. Mr Snow said the Government should continue to pay for the students' education as happened when they first arrived.

"It is blatantly unfair for the Government to put pressure on local authorities to spend money where it has not been budgeted for unless they make the extra resources available", he said.

"There is no question of grants already made to students being cut before their course is finished. The only students now in difficulties are those who commenced a course without having been awarded a grant. Some started despite the fact that they had been told they would not qualify because of the three-year residence rules. Other students are waiting until September to apply again after the three years in this country are completed.

"Brent strongly reject allegations that we have shed our responsibility to these students. We believe we have kept within the rules by refusing to make arbitrary decisions and we have upheld an equal responsibility to the ratepapers.

Kingston stick to their guns

Kingston upon Thames, the only local authority in England and Wales which has refused to submit comprehensive plans, is to stick by its guns.

An hour-long meeting at the Commons last week, between Mr Reginald Prentice, the Education Secretary, and a top-level deputation from the borough ended with neither side able to persuade the other to change its mind.

Mr William Marshall, chairman of Kingston Education Committee, and leader of the delegation, said later: "We agreed to differ".

They told Mr Prentice why they felt it was right that the present system of selection should be retained. Mr Prentice, in turn, reiterated that it was Government policy to introduce comprehensive education at all levels.

"We told Mr Prentice that if he put in writing the views expressed this afternoon we will put them before the council and they can then make up their minds whether to stand by their present position or whether they want to have second thoughts.

"My personal view is that they will stand by their present view."

Mr Prentice had also indicated that if the Government were not able to get their way by persuasion and cooperation they would probably have to consider legislation.

Asked if Kingston would accept legislation forcing it to go comprehensive, Mr Marshall said: "It would depend on what the legislation was. To operate an educational Clay Cross would be quite wrong".

Belfast merger to go ahead

Two Belfast grammar schools, Annadale Boys' and Carolan Girls' are to amalgamate. Approval of the merger by Belfast Education and Library Board ratified a decision by the education sub-committee six weeks ago after months of controversy.

Meanwhile the oldest school in the city has been reprieved. Although recommended to close Brown Street Primary in north Belfast because of falling population the sub-committee decided it could still be viable with the present annual pupil intake of 100.

Portora looks out for pupils

Portora Royal School, Enniskillen, one of Ireland's leading public schools, is running into difficulties. To combat a 35 per cent drop in enrolment during the past six years it is to advertise for boarders.

Portora, where both Oscar Wilde and Samuel Becket were educated, was for decades one of the few educational institutions in Northern Ireland where future pupils were registered for enrolment at birth.

But times have changed. "We used to rely heavily on intake from the south of Ireland as well as from England and abroad", said the headmaster, Mr Tom Garrett, "but with the political instability here the demand for boarding places has dropped drastically." He felt it was now necessary to advertise.

While the troubles have been the major cause of the decline in numbers, inflation and the breakthrough in education in the Republic have compounded their difficulties.

"Though our fees, at £800 a year, are still fairly low in comparison to some English public schools, because we do not have a rich catchment area like the South East of England, inflation has undoubtedly taken its toll."

Meanwhile the school remembers fondly the day when it made a first eleven cricketer out of such an unlikely candidate as Samuel Becket.

Boys on the wrong side of the law

Peter Evans, Home Affairs Correspondent of The Times, visits a new borstal.

Glen Parva—a new borstal, near Leicester, opened by the Home Secretary last week—has its share of the sort of boy described above. They are the ones marked out as potential recidivists perhaps even before they went to school.

A fifth of the inmates have little or no support from their families and the average number of children in the family is between five and six. A sixth have been in borstal before. Most have committed burglary, crimes of violence, or have taken and driven away motor vehicles.

Statistics have caused a good deal of depression about the ability of borstal regimes to overcome all this. Four out of five 16-year-old boys discharged from borstals in 1970 were convicted again within two years, most of them within nine months. Yet half of them were sent back to borstals when first reconvicted.

This illustrates the failure of borstals, but also the persistence, nevertheless, of belief in them. Among borstal youths of all ages, 55.2 per cent were convicted again.

Obviously, the roots of their delinquency lie elsewhere, and the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders are holding a series of conferences with professions, such as teachers, planners and architects to try to encourage a more coordinated approach to crime prevention.

Meanwhile, places like Glen Parva have to pick up the pieces. Inspired by an imaginative governor, Mr Peter Timms, the regime there is an advance on the more sterile approach of some places in the prison service.

Illiteracy is one problem they try to tackle. Thirty-five of the boys in the training unit have a reading age below nine, and their reading difficulties are just one part of the multi-deprivation which often forms the background of boys in serious trouble with the law.

Some of the boys get individual tuition because of the help given by volunteers from the community who come in to teach them. This is important, particularly when borstals often face hostility from communities which resent them being sited locally. This can mean they are remote and out of contact with the sort of environment into which the boys have to be released.

By being in the midst of a strong local community and near houses and shops, Glen Parva has an advantage which is being used. There is a refreshing involvement by local people. As well as the volunteers helping with remedial teaching, there is a group of families who have "adopted" those inmates with no support from their own families. This is an attempt to overcome at least one of the handicaps described by Dr West above.

By being part of the community, Glen Parva is helping to arouse concern about the real causes of crime and interest in overcoming them.

Previous experiments at redirecting regimes in borstals have failed partly because the boys have not been committed enough to the training. At Glen Parva, boys discuss with staff what sort of training would best suit them individually, and then sign a contract to do it. They are then organized into group workshops in which one officer has particular responsibility for six trainees.

Every Friday, there is an open discussion of complaints, which are dismissed or noted. One was about food. Now the boys cook it under supervision. Glen Parva is running a training restaurant linked with an outside FE college. Wearing waiters' uniforms, they serve meals to visitors at the borstal.

Boys who respond well can go on day release. About 25 take part in the kitchen, catering and waiting course, 36 are on construction industry training courses, and seven are attending colleges of further education on day release in various subjects.

Often it is difficult for a person released from custody to get a job which matches his qualifications. Boys at Glen Parva are being offered places on a course to turn them into skilled machine operators, which has been transferred there after closure of a borstal near Lincoln. There the record was good: 85 per cent were placed in jobs.

At present, about 20 trainees are studying various subjects for O-level, and two have been working for A-levels. One trainee who was at university has been given time for private study so that he can continue his course under the supervision of the borstal's education officer.

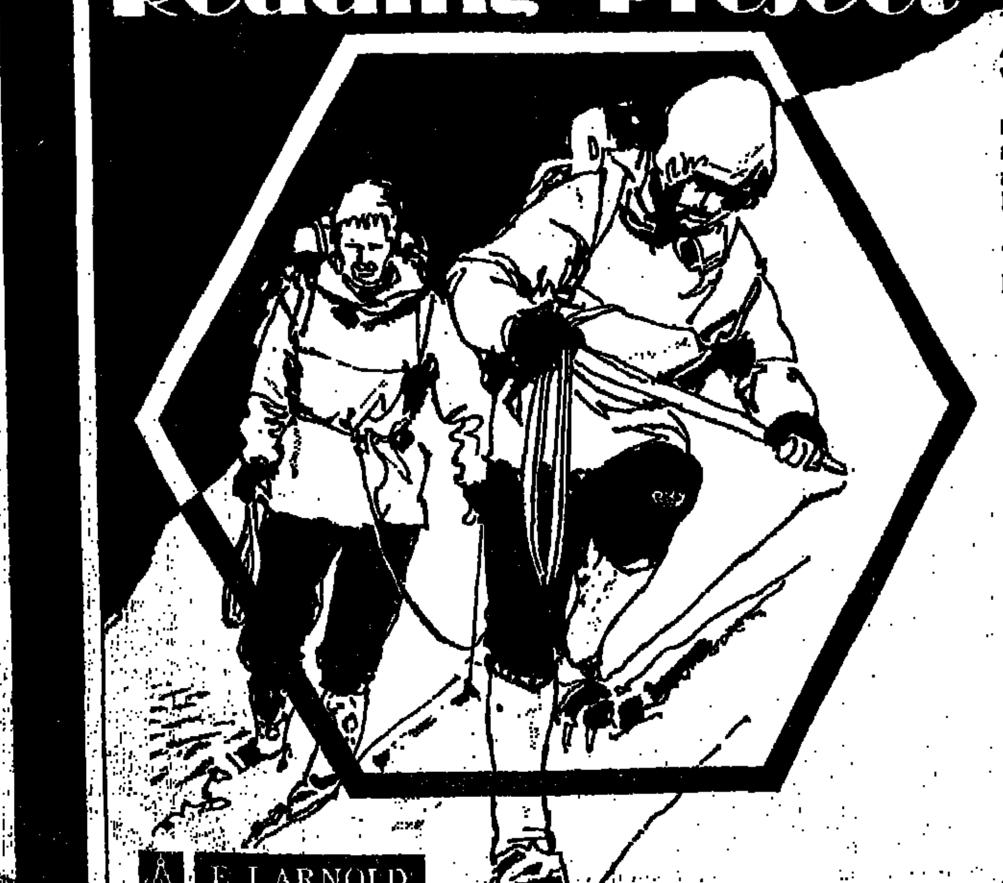
The education officer is supported by four full-time teachers and 47 part-timers provided by the local education authority.

The first borstal trainees were admitted to Glen Parva last July, and there are now about 175 in the training unit, as well as about 40 young men awaiting allocation. Ages range from 15 to 21.

When completed, probably in 1977-78, the 31-acre site will include a secure training borstal for 300 young offenders, a remand and assessment centre for 300 young men awaiting trial and sentence, and a hospital providing medical and psychiatric care for 80 patients, including some from other establishments.

Who becomes delinquent? was published in 1973 on behalf of the Institute of Criminology, Cambridge by Heinemann Educational Books, £4.50.

West Riding Modern Language Reading Project



E J ARNOLD

This project, jointly developed by the West Riding Education Authority and E. J. Arnold has resulted in a series of well-illustrated non-fiction readers for pupils who have studied French for 2–6 years.

The books are based on manuscripts written specially for the project by world-renowned French scientists, technologists and men and women of action or adapted from their work by the Project team. They aim to make reading in French as pleasurable, authentic and informative as reading can be in the native language.

Each of the 12 titles is at three levels of difficulty aimed at the age groups, 12–13 years, 14–15 years and 16–17 years. The first three sets of titles are now published and are listed below. Further titles are to follow.

Le Pétrole	(for 12–13 year olds)	35 p
L'histoire du Pétrole	(for 14–15 year olds)	33 p
L'industrie du Pétrole	(for 16–17 year olds)	34 p
Sauvetage en Montagne	(for 12–13 year olds)	35 p
Sauvetage à 3000 mètres	(for 14–15 year olds)	33 p
Sauvetage aux Drus	(for 16–17 year olds)	34 p
Le Champagne	(for 12–13 year olds)	35 p
L'histoire du Champagne	(for 14–15 year olds)	33 p
L'industrie du Champagne	(for 16–17 year olds)	34 p

Headmasters' Association conference

Boost staff morale heads told

The prime responsibility of heads now that maintained schools are under attack is to strengthen the morale of their staff, said Mr Donald Frith, head of Archbishop Holgate's School, York, on Friday.

Giving the presidential address to the Headmasters' Association conference, he said that heads should do everything they could to enhance the professional self-respect of their staff.

"I believe this stems more from the way in which they are treated by heads than from any other single factor; from their feeling that they are being genuinely involved in decision making; that their problems and difficulties are understood; that their ideas are listened to, that they have a chance to use their own initiative."

Heads should fight for vastly extended opportunities for in-service training and persuade local authorities to provide them without waiting for big cash handouts from the Department of Education and Science.

In-service training would have to mean a great deal more than courses by experts. These courses had their place when they had been specially devised to meet a declared need of teachers.

Many existing courses were too general. "Similarly many Schools Council projects have had far less effect than they ought to have had, either because they are too little adaptable to particular situations, or because teachers simply do not know enough about them."

Teachers would welcome time and opportunity—perhaps one day a week for a term—to work out new techniques and gather new materials appropriate to their own schools.

"Colleges of education should be in the strongest imaginable position to support such ventures, and it should not be beyond the wit of schools and local authorities working together to find means of releasing teachers for this sort of work, without imposing extra burdens on colleagues."

'Too many weaklings in the classroom'

There are too many weak teachers in schools because the focus moved away from the classroom in the 1960s, said Mr Michael Marland, head of Woodberry Down, North London, on Saturday.

He told the Headmasters' Association conference at Cranfield Institute of Technology, that everything in the 1960s took attention away from how the classroom was run. Teachers were forced to become researchers, curriculum developers, and politicians rather than teachers. This trend, coupled with high teacher turnover, had left the schools with too many weak teachers.

Schools were also suffering from two popular fallacies—that the curriculum was breaking down and that there was a conflict between the middle class values of teachers and working class pupils.

The curriculum fallacy was borrowed from America. Critics tended to make unscholarly generalizations like "the curriculum which no one believes in". They were also selective in the courses they looked at.

The "class culture conflict" was an empty cliche of the radical left. "The secondary school of today has an immense amount to offer the working class pupil in the inner cities, and the pupils and their parents know it and appreciate it."

In London it was the middle class children who were most dissident. The working class child took activities for what they were. The middle class child tended to try to relate it to something at home.

Mr Marland criticized schools which were doctrinaire about mixed ability teaching. There were two opposite philosophies, he said—that you include all pupils together or you separate them off according to individual needs. Both were right. His own view was that the family model was best—you should keep the children together as much as possible but you should be quite prepared to separate them off when appropriate.

At Woodberry Down the classes were largely mixed-ability, but they also had special classes for those doing Latin, for slow learners, and so on. One of the best things that a school as an institution did was to bring together children in classes.

The school curriculum should reflect the greater degree of choice children now had from early childhood. It was better for a child to have most of his curriculum compulsory if the rest of the time he had genuine freedom of choice than to have half-way measures.

Dr Patrick Nuttgens, director of Leeds Polytechnic, said students should not be considered successful simply if they had acquired a certain amount of knowledge. What mattered was whether they had acquired the skill to use the knowledge effectively.

"That is peculiarly difficult to examine, though with every year we develop more ways of doing it."

If action was considered every bit as estimable as thought, "promotion and staff development should be based, not just on scholarship and learning, but upon the ability to carry out tasks—in this case the task of teaching".

This idea also affected the nature of knowledge itself. Many facts were probably different when they were seen in a context of action rather than reflection. It also had implications for the organization of education — knowledge gained through action required cooperation with others.

This meant that there was no one kind of higher education institution that could carry it out precisely. "The more action oriented all institutions become, the more demand there is for such courses from potential students and from society, the more varied and complex will all the institutions be."

In reply to questions, Dr Nuttgens said that if student numbers had not been declining, the polytechnic would not be interested in merging with colleges of education. "Colleges of education suffer from the delusion that because some years ago they were allowed to shake the hand of a vice-chancellor in some way they are intellectually respectable."

Colleges would lose their sense of community which was derived from their size and singleness of purpose. They would gain by coming into contact with people of higher academic standards and in different disciplines.

Red light for 'parents' charter'

The Education (Parents' Charter) Bill failed to make any progress in the Commons last Friday when the Deputy Speaker refused to accept a Conservative plea that the motion for the second reading should be put.

Thus the Bill, although set down for future Fridays, is certain to get no further. Government whips are unlikely to let it through without further debate when the second reading comes up again.

Introducing his Bill Mr William Shelton (Streatham, C.) who said he was a governor of "a good comprehensive school in South London", outlined the five main provisions.

The Bill, he said, had nothing to do with parent power but was intended to tilt slightly the balance towards parental rights and away from l.e.a.s. Involvement of parents in education could only be welcome; there should be a partnership between parents, school and children.

In the 30 years since the Education Act 1944 no parent in England had won a court case when he had disagreed with the way his child was being educated. He proposed redrafting the Act to provide that l.e.a.s should educate children according to the wishes of their parents unless they could show that it was unreasonable so to do on grounds of disproportionate cost.

He wanted parents to be more involved in the running of schools. At least three parents and two teachers should be on each governing body. Heads should also have the right to be on them.

Too often in too many schools local councillors were put on the governing body because they had won a local election. If they were interested in education, that was excellent; if their interests lay elsewhere, might it not be better to have parents?

Mr Hatton (Manchester, Moss Side, Lab) said the Bill would take them backwards rather than forwards. They ought not to be considering how they could devise some new kind of system to satisfy some parents who, in their hearts, wanted to retain the system of selection in the secondary schools. L.e.a.s should develop secondary schools in such a way that opportunities for each and every boy and girl who attended them were continually expanded.

Mr Keith Hampson (Ripon, C) said parents were deeply concerned about some of the schools and about where their children were going to end up.

They had a major convert to their side in the editor of the TES who, in an article that week had pointed out the importance of diversification, of a plurality of educational institutions and of the need to have some sort of variety of system to match the variety of needs and potentials of children.

Mr Norman St John-Stevas, Opposition spokesman on education (Chelmsford, C) said the Bill was wholly in accord with Conservative basic principles and for all he knew might be in accord with basic Socialist principles.

The basic principle involved here was that the right to educate children belonged to parents and not to the state. Parents wanted a say.

While many l.e.a.s took this into account some officals did not. He had had experience of parents being brushed aside as though they were irrelevant pests.

Parental wishes were a much wider concept than merely a choice between a grammar and a comprehensive school. They wanted to choose between different types of comprehensive, between schools that streamed and those that did not, between single-sex and mixed schools, between religious and non-religious, between large and small. This wide range of choice was involved in the changes the Bill proposed.

As for appeal tribunals, parents wanted to be sure their case had been heard impartially. Having parents on the board of governors would create a sense of identification between parents and school.

Mr Ernest Armstrong, Under Secretary for Education and Science, said there was more direct parental involvement in Britain's schools than ever before, although not as much as they would want.

They wanted to give parents as much say as possible in the kind of education their children were offered. But they had to face reality. Whatever they did at least 75 per cent of the children went to schools that were allocated to them.

More and more parents were becoming more and more dissatisfied with the education service and were exerting pressure. The only way to get rid of dissatisfaction about allocation was not to have competition between schools or a pecking order, thus allowing articulate parents to have an advantage, but to practise positive discrimination in favour of schools which in the past had had less than their fair share of resources.

In choice of school, the burden of proof was on the authority. He had been associated with a great number of cases in the department. During the past five years there had never been less than 1,000 choice of school cases a year and the number was increasing every year. In most cases they were settled amicably between the authority and the parents. No order was necessary.

This year the department had intervened and issued orders to eight different authorities involving 25 children so there was no rubber stamping of what an authority wanted.

A genuine comprehensive school offered far more choice to far more parents than any selective system could offer. The Bill came peculiarly from an Opposition which was always preaching that local authorities should be given more power and autonomy."

Public libraries are being nudged towards change. A DES report suggests a facelift and wider involvement with the arts and the community, while the authors of the books in them take to the streets to press for extra payment.

MICHAEL CHURCH asks

Will Britain's libraries be left on the shelf?

Public libraries are at present being given a number of hefty nudges which may fundamentally alter the drift of their operations.

A DES report published this week argues that they should become major centres for cultural activities in the communities they serve. After giving examples of trail-blazing work in particular libraries up and down the country, the report, Public libraries and cultural activities, produced by the English and Welsh library advisory councils, goes on to show ways in which they can develop far beyond their traditional "book-based" role.

Those responsible for the report have placed it firmly in the context of the British class structure. Mr Geoffrey Caston, chairman of the Library Advisory Council (England), and also registrar of Oxford University, said it was time libraries shook off their "bourgeois, middle-class image", which he later identified as an overriding concern for the needs of "readers". Mr F. W. Jessup, chairman of the working party who produced the report, apologized for the middle-class, elitist overtones of the word "cultural" in its title.

Mr Hugh Jenkins, Minister for the Arts, said he looked forward to a situation in which libraries would be "places of entertainment and enjoyment" responding to local needs.

The report asks to be seen as complementary to that of the Russell Committee, concerning itself primarily with "those informal activities to which public libraries have traditionally been especially hospitable". As well as the now widespread practice among libraries of lending gramophone records, arranging concerts and exhibitions, providing rooms for adult education groups and acting as cultural information centres, the report proposes that many libraries might become bases for local arts associations.

The report emphasizes the importance of libraries forging close links with all local recreational and educational institutions, to avoid duplication and to use resources more imaginatively. It picks out Camden as an outstanding example of coordination through unified management, and Thurrock, where a library, a theatre, a museum, an exhibition area and a refreshment area were all welded into one cultural centre in one building.

Mr Jenkins recognized that it would now be impossible for authorities to embark on the more ambitious schemes along these lines. But, given imagination, much could be done on a shoestring budget to interest and engage the two thirds of the population who did not use libraries at all, and Mr Caston has now set up a working party to look into this. Under the chairmanship of Mrs Anne Corbett, a journalist, they will investigate ways in which libraries can make contact with those who at preent might want to use them, but who, for various reasons do not.

The working party will look at the problems of prisoners and hospital patients, the partially sighted, mothers marooned on housing estates, adult illiterates in general, different ethnic groups and also possibly adolescents. The group will examine administrative and financial arrangements between libraries and other institutions, and also the possibility of making links between the library and social services.

On top of all this, librarians are also being nudged from within. Last week the Public Libraries Research Group held a one-day workshop to discuss ways of telling librarians about the national campaign which is being mounted to help adult illiterates (or "to combat adult literacy", as a charming Nuneaton education office circular recently phrased it).

Some delegates at the workshop waxed loud in their denunciation of education officers who could not be bothered to liaise with the libraries in this crucial area, particularly since librarians themselves were beginning to collaborate not only with media resource centres but with radio and television companies. At a Staffordshire library, for example, a pilot scheme is now in operation whereby "new readers" teach themselves to read with the aid of tape recordings.

Meanwhile, on another front, the battle for public lending right—payments to authors for the use of their books in libraries—has moved into a new phase. The militant Writers Action Group, led by Brigid Brophy and Maureen Duffy and supported by the staider Society of Authors and the Writers' Guild of Great Britain, took to the streets last week in a star-spangled demonstration aimed at persuading the Government to fulfil their promise of legislation in this parliamentary session.

In March the DES published a detailed report on the technical and cost aspects of administering public lending right. Mr Jenkins has now decided to allow time for further studies and tests to be carried out, before presenting Parliament with clear and detailed proposals, "probably by the autumn".

The authors have indeed had to make a long haul of it. Their struggle dates back to 1951, when novelist John Brophy (father of Brigid) first advocated a flat loan charge of one penny per book. Vigorous attempts ensued from A. P. Herbert and the Society of Authors to incorporate public lending right into copyright legislation. Then came the setting-up of an Arts Council working party on the subject in 1965, and another working party was later set up by Lord Eccles, whose subsequent report was published with no resulting legislation. In 1974 a private member's Bill was introduced by Mr Ernie Money. This Bill—which was designed to amend the 1956 Copyright Act—received substantial support in Parliament but ran out of time and failed to get a second reading.

The subsequent promise from Mr Norman St John-Stevas when he was Conservative Minister for the Arts to try to introduce public lending right was taken up in turn by his Labour successor, Mr Jenkins, who formally committed the Government to introducing legislation.

Although nothing has been announced, the legislation will probably provide for an annual grant (initially anywhere between £1m and £5m) from central government funds, to be administered by a statutory body.

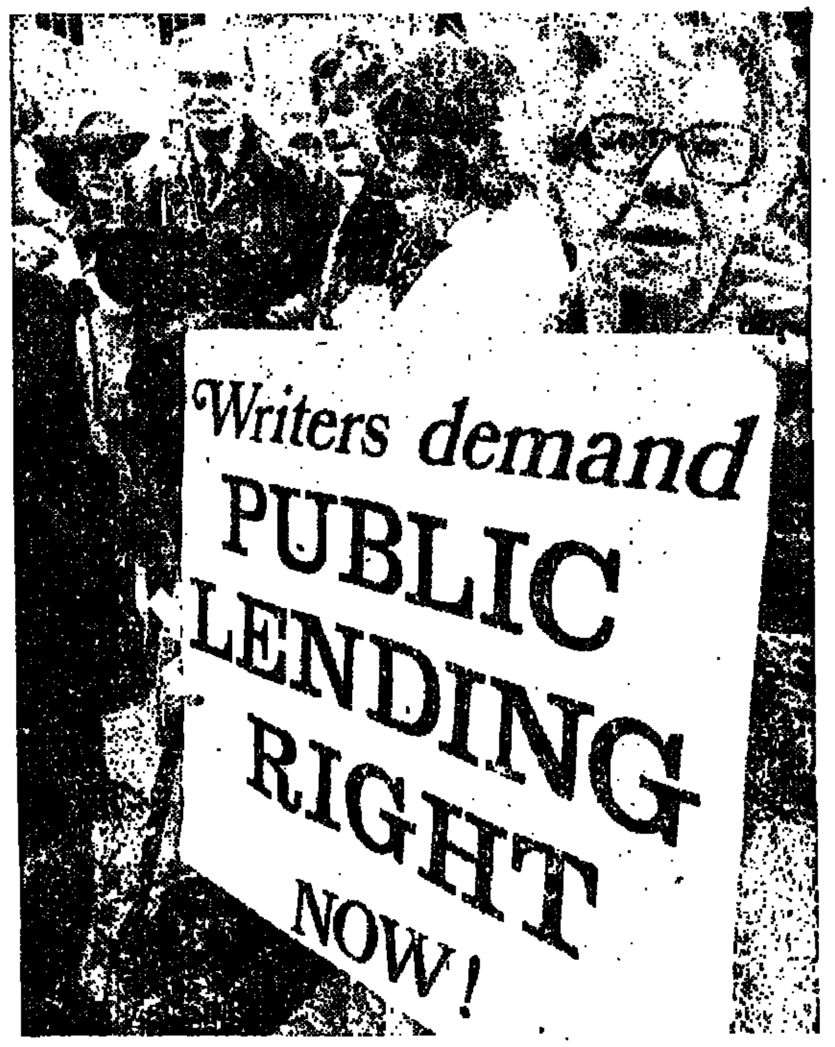
The controversy over whether the money should be apportioned on the basis of books bought or in terms of loans has not yet been resolved, although the minister has publicly declared his preference for loans. The DES are at present running simulations of both schemes. The DES report found that the two schemes would cost about the same and that it could take two years to bring either into full operation.

With some officials in the DES still, it seems, favouring a purchase-based scheme, the authors now firmly united in their demand for loans sampling, which they regard as fairer, and with the librarians officially opposed to either scheme (although the authors claim considerable grassroots support among them), the stage is set for further confrontations.

The debate turns partly on questions of principle. The Society of Authors describe public lending right as "simple justice—neither welfare nor subsidy . . . the right of authors to be paid for their copyright works in libraries".

The Library Association quarrel with the logic of applying piecemeal what they regard as "a new concept in respect of public ownership" which infers "that the community has a continuing obligation to the originator of articles it owns". What about non-book media, they ask, and what about all the artefacts which pass into the domain of common use? They also feel that to introduce public lending right for public libraries but not—at least initially—for institutional or educational ones, will militate unfairly against certain groups of authors. The Writer's Action Group reply that all reforms must start somewhere.

On a practical level, the action group point out that book writers are amoug the lowest paid workers in the community. "An author is paid when a book is sold. But for every book sold in Britain, nine are borrowed from libraries. The Government are forcing Britain's authors to give nine-tenths of their service without pay."



Star-spangled banner: writers with a message at last week's protest.

The Library Association cite the benefits which libraries ("shop windows for the book trade") bring to authors; WAG claim that libraries hurt sales considerably. The librarians also point out that most of the money will go to the already successful authors, leaving the struggling ones still struggling. Instead they propose financial support for "needy or deserving authors" through a fund administered by a body such as the Arts Council.

On another level they are worries that although the public lending right fund will not be set against the library services' regular income, this may happen in the future if the financial situation continues to deteriorate. There is some talk of a repetition of the situation over museum charges.

But if public lending right is finally established, it will not put Britain in the van of any worldwide movement. As WAG point out, the principle has been put into practice—either by stock sampling, loan sampling or purchased-based assessment—in a number of other countries; Denmark (since 1948), in Sweden (since 1955), and more recently, in Norway, Finland, Austria and Australia. Other countries are well on the way.

No one can tell how many beneficiaries the British scheme might produce. Under the loan sampling scheme, 113,000 authors were calculated (according to the DES report) to be eligible, but since public lending right would mean minuscule amounts for most of them, a large proportion may simply not bother to register.

COURSES

post·experience diploma in educational technology

This sandwich course, which commences in September 1975, has been designed to make it realistically possible for teachers librarians, and training personnel to be released from normal duties for two relatively short periods.

- September–December (16 weeks) full time in college studying Instructional Design; Instructional Media; Media Production and Computing.
- January–May in professional practice in the student's own establishment.
- June (4 weeks) full-time in college studying Management of Media Resources and Services and designing and producing a mixed-media learning package.
- July–December in professional practice, implementing and evaluating the prepared package. Project report submitted.

Full details including specific objectives for each component of the course together with application forms are available from The Director, Audio-Visual & Reprographic Unit, Dundee College of Technology, Bell Street, Dundee DD1 1HG

Why does one picture appeal to a child, when another similar picture does not? Colour, realism and activity are known to score; but what counts when the choice is restricted to pictures of one type?

Anthony Booth, an educational psychologist at Anstey College, got about 500 children in five primary schools to choose their favourites from 35 black and white sketches of a man standing in an empty space. Most of the pictures were reproductions of illustrations, some drawn from historical sources. A few were specially drawn. They differed mainly in degree of complexity.

Before the experiment, the children had been asked to draw a man. Booth reasoned that they were likely to select a picture which resembled their own work—in degree of complexity, if nothing else. He found that this was so.

It was rare for a child to choose a simpler picture. In fact, they tended to choose a picture that was a great deal more complicated than their own.

Though only two drew pictures at the fifth and top level of complexity (and more than half drew pictures at levels one and two), no fewer than 188 chose level five pictures. The seven-year-olds were only slightly less likely to go for levels four and five than the 11-year-olds.

Was the answer, then, that children like pictures of the same kind, but better than their own? Booth had a panel of experts grade the experimental pictures on nine separate dimensions — flat or modelled, unrealistic or realistic, naive or sophisticated, and so on. Extra information about the children was collected, too.

Four factors were found to account for almost all the choices not already explained by the tendency towards complexity. The most important was the factor of picture quality. If a picture contained strong contrasts of light and shade, and was clearly drawn, the children liked it no matter how detailed it was. Close on half of all the unexpected results could be put down to this.

Other factors which counted were a child's developmental age; the liveliness of the picture; and a child's sex. These accounted for a further 12 per cent, 15 per cent, and 8 per cent respectively of the unexpected results.

Taste, at this age, is only loosely related to what a child can produce himself, the author concludes. He likes something a good deal more complex than he can produce. But to capture his fancy, the picture has to make a clear statement and be intrinsically interesting as well as complex. And even then, the brighter child will be more demanding.

Educational Studies, vol 1, no 1.

Migrants make better pupils, say Australians

Throughout their entire school careers, the children of migrants to Australia do better than their native-born peers of equivalent ability. The initial disadvantages of migration—including, for many, an unfamiliar language—appear to be rapidly overcome.

But this should not be seen as a sign that migrant children need no special help, say Samuel Hammond and Tamara Kotler, of the University of Melbourne. Success merely shows how a good home can help a child. Without this migrant children can end up as extremely confused and withdrawn young adults.

A Melbourne study of 1967-68 showed migrant children, in general, to be doing better than native-born ones. This study tracked down about 360 of the sample of 392 boys who had been surveyed 10 years before, when they were 10-year-old fifth-graders in Melbourne schools. Of these, 41 came from migrant families, some of them only months in the country at the time of the first survey.

Few were English-speaking. The largest groups came from southern and eastern Europe, and only three were from the British Isles. Yet only five years later, the migrant group did better in the school intermediate examinations; and more of them were still in full-time education five years after that, when the follow-up took place.

Ability, alone, was no explanation. Nor was the social status of the children's families in Australia. The strongest clue to emerge from interviews with the children's parents was a tendency for migrant parents to make more excursions, to have more active social lives and to attend church more regularly.

The authors devised what they call a "resources measure" to grade the quality of a child's background according to factors known to be important to personal development. The five factors were handicap (physical, psychological or linguistic); social class for two generations; family harmony; extended family relationships; and community involvement. Scores of two points, one point or none were given for each factor. The total score could range from nil to 10 points.

Compared with the native-born Australians, the migrants in the follow-up study had low scores. Only about a third, against nearly half, had scores above 6.6. They lost particularly on linguistic handicap, social class, extended family and some community links. They gained in absence of other handicaps, family harmony and special kinds of community links.

Those with a good score (6.6 or above) did far better than their native born counterparts. On a 10-point scale they scored 6 against 3.9 for their performance in the intermediate examinations, 7 against 4.7 for educational achievement by the age of 20, 5.1 against 4 for keenness, 5.2 as against 3.9 for social competence, and 5.8 as against 3.8 for enterprise. The middle migrant group (resources scores 3.3 to 6.6) were about the native born average. This shows the strength of a good home background, say the authors.

On educational performance even the low resources migrants scored well. They were closer to the native born average than native born Australians with low scores.

Where this group were noticeably different, however, was in personal adjustment. In school, they were characterized by dependence and lack of initiative, and also by high anxiety. Out of school, they had abnormally low scores for keenness (two points only, on the 10 point scale), enterprise and social competence.

All the migrant groups were characterized, to some extent, by personality problems, the authors point out. This seems to be the price of success against high odds. Even the top group were inclined to be reserved and anxious. But a good family, often backed by a good ethnic community, seemed to make up for a great deal.

The low group did not even have this. As a result, they were ill placed to meet the challenge of their new country. Their academic success was not backed by self-confidence or a sense of purpose.

There is a world of difference, the authors conclude, between the migrant family with strong internal links and a network of kin and friends in the new community, and the isolated, disunited family who see a new life in purely material terms. Both may be ambitious for their children, but the child from the latter family will be personally handicapped. These children need help, they think, no matter how well they may do at school.

Young viewers immune to TV violence

Television programmes such as Tom and Jerry do not seem to encourage children to be more violent, according to a recent book on the effects of violence shown by the media.

The authors are Dr Dennis Howitt of Leicester University and Dr Guy Cumberbatch of Aston University.

They say there is little empirical evidence that violence on television or in children's comics triggers disturbed children to act violently, or that children who watch violent scenes over and over again have their reactions blunted.

Several research studies showed that aggressive or delinquent children were no more likely than normal children to identify with aggressive heroes. But they admit that fans of pop stars, for example, can be influenced to buy similar clothes.

In laboratory experiments, children had been shown to imitate the aggressive behaviour of a filmed model. But Dr Howitt and Dr Cumberbatch question whether this can be applied to real life behaviour. "While striking an inflated plastic clown may well seem to be aggressive, it would also seem to bear the essential characteristics of play."

The critical issue was whether or not the child performed the behaviour he learnt, not whether he learnt it.

The authors recognize that their conclusions about the small effect of media violence might not convince parents. So they look at ways that parents can shield their children from the influence of television. Research studies in the United States indicated that parents' attempts to limit the number of violent television programmes their children watched, or to explain and interpret the violence, had no effect on their children's aggressive behaviour.

"The evidence as it stands, even assuming the effects of mass media violence on real life violence, indicates that no matter what the parent might attempt to do to shield the child from the undesirable socializing influence of television, the efforts are doomed to failure."

Dead end ahead for Leyland?

At the risk of boring everybody with what the Secretary of State for Industry calls the "reinvigoration" of British industry, it seems only proper to point out that the Ryder report on British Leyland's unhappy plight, itself the basis of the Government's decision virtually to take over the company, has nothing of substance to say about research and development.

So far as I can tell, Sir Don Ryder and his helpers have merely urged that British Leyland should quickly come to a decision about the acquisition of a track on which new models and the output of the production lines can be tested.

There is nothing about the kinds of projects on which British Leyland's American competitors spend substantial sums of money—the development of new kinds of engines (some based on electrical batteries), the evolution of new methods of transmission and even the design of entirely novel transport systems.

In Britain, the development of new electronic ignition systems for internal combustion engines has been left to the components suppliers, and not pushed forward by British Leyland.

Nobody would argue that activities like these can be supported by a company so short of cash that it has been unable to modernize its production lines and thus remain competitive. But the object of what the Government now intend, and in particular of the investment of £1,400m, is to remedy this situation.

So it is by no means too soon to ask whether British Leyland should not be laying the foundations for a programme of technical innovation without which it will surely remain the old-fashioned and unenterprising animal it is now. And, to carry the argument a little further, the lack of substantial recommendations about research and development in the Ryder report suggests that those who wrote it may have serious doubts that their proposals will actually create a prosperous company.

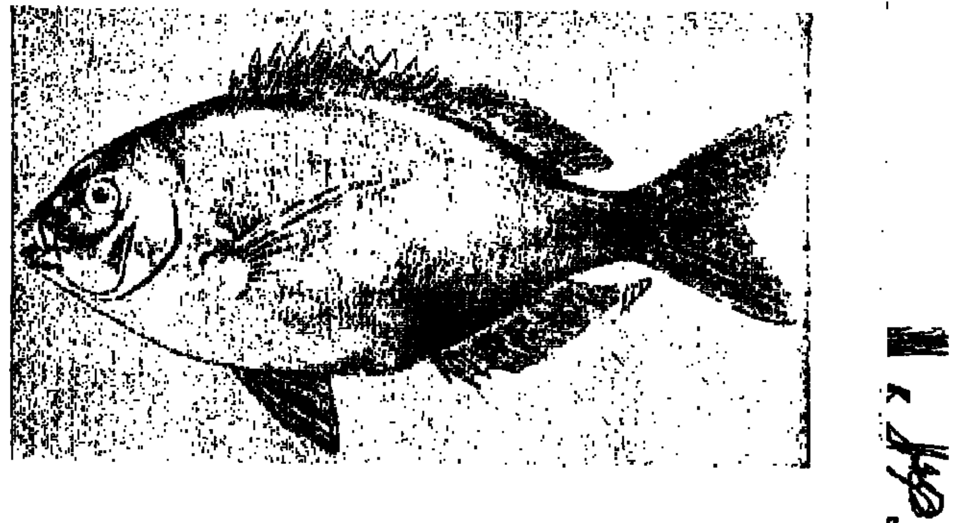
British farming, fortunately, seems to be moving in the right direction. For the past three years, there has been a sense among the agricultural research people, not just the Agricultural Research Council but the Ministry of Agriculture's own staff, that technical innovation could yield great benefits.

It is an odd contrast with the feeling at the beginning of the decade when the Agricultural Research Council was so much the common butt of criticism from inside and outside the government that departmental inquiries were set in train whose most spectacular product was the Rothschild report on the reorganization of publicly supported research.

One of the Rothschild recommendations was that each ministry with an interest in basic research should immediately acquire a chief scientist. Dr H. C. Pereira, chief scientist at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for the past two years, is by common consent one of the most effective of the new men.

His second annual report, published last week, is justifiably an optimistic document, and provides some substance for the Government's hopes for increasing British food production made public just a week earlier. It is not just that it should be possible to increase the yield of crops from land now in use but that radical innovations such as fish farming are no longer round the corner.

The biggest danger now is that those responsible for handing out public money may not fully appreciate that agriculture now provides an almost unique opportunity for turning investment in research into increased production within the decade.



Fatfish by any other name

One of the minor problems of life in South Africa is that anglers are never sure what they should call the fish they catch.

What has happened is that settlers from different parts of the world have used different common names for several species. One native of the 2,000-mile eastern seaboard of South Africa, Pachymetopon grande (see picture) has no fewer than 14 common names, including blue hottentor, das, janbruin, fatfish, vetvis, butterfish, butterbream, bronze bream and copper bream.

Professor Margaret Smith of the Institute of Ichthyology at Rhodes University has now produced a monumental classification of 1,300 sea fish species in South Africa, and she hopes people will take to calling Pachymetopon grande the "bronze bream", bruin hottentot in Afrikaans. It is hardly the most memorable of the common names already in use, and I am sure even Professor Smith will be surprised if her suggestion is widely accepted.

Dune buggy : is this the tractor of the future ?

Harvest in the sand

It is not just in Britain that agricultural research is booming. In California, two agriculturalists from the Davis campus of California University have embarked on a project to grow barley on sand dunes. Their calculation is that the world's sand dunes might become productive agricultural land if only there were strains of crop plants able to tolerate the salinity of these arid places, and that barley is a useful crop with which to start chiefly because so much is known about its breeding.

By the account I have, it has been possible to select some salt-tolerant strains of barley simply by growing plants in laboratory tanks in which the water is laden with large quantities of salt. The first field trials of the new strains will come this autumn, when barley will be sown on the sand dunes of Bodega Bay, a few miles north of San Francisco.

One of the hopes of those responsible is that it may be possible by this means to make use of the plant nutrients normally present in sea water and which accumulate in sand dunes by evaporation. If the scheme works, we shall no doubt find that horrid invention, the dune buggy, becomes the dune tractor and the dune harvester.

Small rise in percentage of coloured pupils—forecast

Primary schools in England's largest cities are likely to admit a slightly larger proportion of coloured children over the next three years even if the level of immigration stays the same, according to figures published this week by the Registrar General.

The figures show that births to mothers from the New Commonwealth and Pakistan living in a number of large cities have been falling, but not as fast as the birthrate of the indigenous population.

This means that the percentage of immigrant children starting school in these areas is likely to rise by a small amount.

Between 1969 and 1973 the proportion of births in Leicester to mothers from the New Commonwealth or Pakistan rose from 18.4 to 24.6 per cent. In Bradford it rose from 22.9 to 24.9 per cent; in Birmingham from 20.0 to 22.9 per cent; in Coventry from 13.6 to 14.6 per cent; in Manchester from 9,2 to 10.2 per cent; in Leeds from 8.1 to 8.7 per cent and in Greater London from 17.1 to 17.8 per cent.

But in Wolverhampton the proportion has dropped from 26.0 per cent in 1969 to 25.0 per cent in 1973.

Not all the births listed as to mothers of New Commonwealth or Pakistan origin are necessarily coloured. Nor do the figures necessarily mean that immigrants have larger families.

Women born in India, for example, whose parents were stationed there, and who then returned to Britain would be included in this category.

There's money in enriched uranium

Last week in Paris, Dr A. J. A. Roux, chairman of the South African Atomic Energy Board, finally told the world something of the technical basis of the South African process for producing enriched uranium, on which he and his colleagues have been working in the greatest secrecy for the past five years.

The result is not much of a surprise. It turns out that the South Africans hope to produce uranium containing more than the natural proportion of 0.7 per cent of uranium-235 by an aerodynamic process, with obvious features in common with a scheme put forward 10 years ago in West Germany.

The principle is this. If you take a quantity of uranium hexafluoride gas and force it under pressure through a nozzle, and if the shape of the nozzle is carefully chosen, there is a tendency for the lighter isotope (uranium-235) to be concentrated in those streams of gas compelled to move in the most curved paths.

With luck, it is then possible to separate this stream of gas from the rest and put it through another similar nozzle, increasing the concentration of uranium-235 still further. If it turns out that the South Africans have succeeded in making the system function, they will indeed have stolen a march on the Germans and Japanese who have tried and failed in the past few years.

But why should the South Africans have gone to all this trouble? For what it is worth, I believe them when they say they have no intention of making nuclear weapons—their political difficulties in southern Africa are already enough to be going on with.

The real incentive for developing an indigenous enrichment process for uranium is that it will in principle allow South Africa to export enriched uranium and not natural uranium, thus making sure of a larger share of what is called the economic rent from uranium than they could otherwise hope to gain. My own guess is that other suppliers or uranium, Australia and Canada in particular, will not be far behind.

Given that present plans for the development of nuclear energy in the industrialized West imply a vast increase of the demand for uranium in the early 1980s, it seems inevitable that they will all enjoy a sellers' market in the decade ahead. And then it is likely we shall find ourselves complaining at yet another price ring for a raw material—a uranium sellers' successor to OPEC (which by then should have dissolved).

OVERSEAS FIELD STUDY CENTRES
Winter programme, October 1975–April 1976

Aerocruise has widened its programme of low-cost educational travel for 1975-76, introducing a number of new field study centres. But the basic Aerocruise concept remains unchanged. Realistic prices, with everything included and no hidden extras.
The cost includes return flights by modern jets of Laker Airways; full board accommodation in good-class hotels or youth hostels (except in Berlin, where bed-and-breakfast accommodation only is provided); packed meals as required; transfers between destination airports and hotels; all airport taxes. And Group Leaders are accepted free on the basis of one Leader for every 15 students paying full fare (pro rata for lesser numbers).
Educational notes and photoplays with commentary are available for each centre.

Holland

Open School experiment aims at the disadvantaged

AMSTERDAM

Holland's first Open School is to be aimed at the educationally disadvantaged. The government's Open School commission recommends that the school should start in September 1976 with three experimental projects running for an initial two years. These should offer second chance education to adults without secondary schooling living in rural areas, young people between the ages of 17 and 30 without a school leaving diploma living in cities and married women with only domestic science schooling behind them.

The commission has rejected a proposal by Dr Jos van Kemenade, Minister of Education, that the Open School should be at grammar-school level. It argues that this would be too ambitious for the groups it was trying to reach. Instead, it recommends a wide range of self-development and vocational courses, as well as general secondary school courses. Diplomas should be optional. The commission expressly warns of the dangers of turning the school into "a diploma factory".

A study group has been set up to determine how to present the material. The commission is against using radio and television exclusively, but proposes a combination of self-study, use of the media and study groups. The latter would be set up in clubs or libraries in the students' own neighbourhoods.

Before the Open School starts a massive publicity campaign at local and national level will be launched and later this year a second report will deal with its financing. It is expected that running costs will be shared by the education and cultural and recreational ministries, and that poorer students will be able to apply for grants.

Unesco

Top shakeup will pose problems

Richard Hoggart: returning after five years.

Unesco is facing an unprecedented situation caused by the coincidence that all its five assistant directors-general posts are due to become vacant during the course of this year.

One of the five is Mr Richard Hoggart, author of The Uses of Literacy and formerly a professor at Birmingham University, who joined the organization five years ago.

The position is to be discussed by M Amadou Mahtar M'Bow the new director-general, and the 40-member Executive Board at a major meeting beginning here on Monday.

The ADGs, each of whom is responsible for directing a large sector of the organization's activities, together with the deputy director-general, who at present continues to be Mr John Fobes of the United States, are the director-general's top secretariat officials, constituting a kind of Cabinet.

The director-general is responsible for the appointment of the ADGs, but for top-level posts it is provided that he shall discuss his ideas and plans—including possible changes in structure—with the board before arriving at decisions.

The outgoing ADGs are: for natural sciences, Mr J. M. Harrison of Canada; for social sciences, humanities and culture, Mr Richard Hoggart of the United Kingdom; for communication, Mr Alberto Obligado of Argentina; and for administration, Mr Vladimir Erofeev of the Soviet Union. M M'Bow was previously assistant director-general for education.

Mr Hoggart, who was leaving the organization this week, will spend eight months as a Fellow of Sussex University writing a book about Unesco before taking up an appointment in January as warden of Goldsmiths' College, London.

Australia

Boring and dull, say pupils

from John Kirkaldy

SYDNEY

Australian schools are dull, boring, authoritarian and fail to achieve any real educational goals. These are some of the claims made in a recently published book called Schools Out! edited by Dany Humphreys and Ken Newcombe.

The book is based on a nationwide essay competition organized by the authors and The Australian newspaper in 1971 (topic—The School for Me). Over 1,000 essays were entered and the book uses extracts from them to make its critique of the present system.

The childrens' targets of attack are perhaps predictable—discipline, exams, uniform and compulsory games. What was not so predictable was the general dislike of school and its functions.

Some of the best suggestions concerned curriculum development. Children wished to see a greater emphasis placed on migrant languages, everyday living and Asian studies.

"Students should be able to study politics, general law, government administration and all the 'little things' which an adult learns through experience, such as hire purchase, medical benefits, filling in tax returns and census forms and how to budget on a limited income". Coralie, 16.

What did the students want done about schools in general? Nearly all the answers were within the existing system—humane teachers, better playgrounds, better facilities and easier discipline.

The authors go much further in their proposals. They would like to see the abolition of all schools based on the present system and the creation of citizen resource and information centres, study cooperatives and learning exchanges.

"We say that a totally different concept of education is needed, where schools are about learning as distinct from schooling". There would be no compulsion, students attending because they desired knowledge, and there would be not arbitrary educational age cut-off.

Italy

Family rights now for all

from Dalbert Hallenstein

VERONA

After a political and parliamentary debate lasting nearly a decade Italy's patriarchal family legal code has finally been modernized.

The new law, which came into effect last week, will positively affect the lives of hundreds of thousands of until now underprivileged young people.

Children born out of wedlock will have equal rights with their legitimate half-brothers and sisters.

Parents will have the right to recognize their natural children even if these were conceived while the parents were still married to other people.

Such children have hitherto been classified as both illegitimate and "adulterous".

The new legislation also provides for the equal ownership between husband and wife of capital, property and possessions accumulated during the period of marriage.

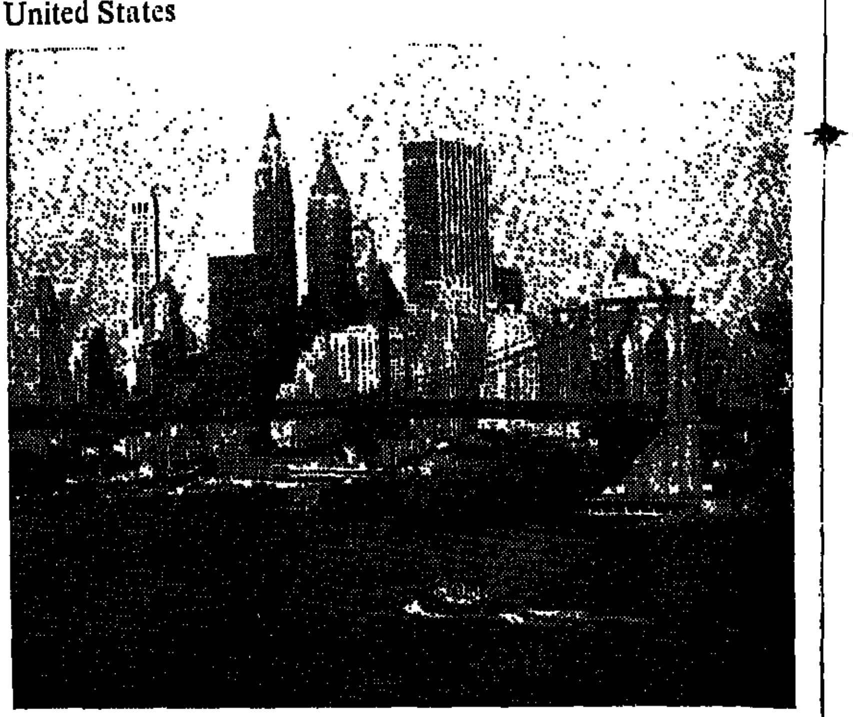
10,000 want to be professors

Some 10,000 academics are currently sitting examinations for 2,500 extra university professorships.

The 2,500 new professors, who are expected to take up their posts in November, will be the first to have been appointed for several years.

A 1969 law halted the appointment of new university staff pending reforms of the whole university system. These have still not been presented to Parliament; in the meanwhile "short-term" measures including the forthcoming appointments, which will almost double the number of professors, have had to be introduced to meet the chronic understaffing of the universities.

United States



New York: 'desperate' financial situation.

Budget crisis may spark closures and layoffs

NEW YORK

The New York City mayor's office has proposed closing 43 schools and laying off or not replacing 2,533 full-time teachers and 2,374 substitute teachers in an attempt to improve the city's almost desperate financial situation.

It has also instructed the City University of New York to make savings of a total of $6.7m by cutting back on teaching staff and the Search for Education, Elevation and Knowledge (SEEK) remedial programme, and by increasing staff teaching loads and graduate students' fees.

The proposals are part of an economy drive affecting fire services, hospitals and health centres as well as education. They have created strong opposition from educationists in the city.

Most of the 43 schools provisionally chosen for closure are under-utilized and are between 50 and 90 years old, the mayor's office claims. Their pupils will be sent to other schools near by, which have adequate space and teachers to cope with the extra numbers.

But Dr Bernard Gifford, of the Board of Education, has protested that most of the schools to be closed are in predominantly black neighbourhoods, and has suggested that the mayor's office is discriminating against black pupils.

Two of the schools chosen to receive pupils from schools to be closed down were discovered last week not to exist: one is under construction and the other in the design stage.

The proposed cutback in teacher numbers in the city system will mean an increase in class sizes to 32 pupils per class in elementary schools and 33 in junior high schools. The mayor's office said that this would mean an extra one or two pupils in each class.

Dr Robert Kibbee, chancellor of the City University, has strongly objected to the proposed cuts in teaching staff at CUNY, saying that "the unexpected increase in enrolment in February and the major enrolment increase expected in the fall, resulting from the recession, have already placed undue strain on the resources of City University".

Further budget cuts might result in "serious reductions in programmes and services for 2,266 students".

Dr Kibble said that the university was "dedicated to maintaining the SEEK programme in its present form". The mayor's office had proposed stripping SEEK of its main function—remedial education for disadvantaged students—and keeping it only as an agency for dispensing financial aid to needy undergraduates.

Since the CUNY "Open Admissions" policy was instituted in 1970 allowing all students who had finished high school to enter the university whatever their academic attainments, SEEK has provided remedial assistance for students academically below first-year college level.

Broadcasters urged to play wider link role

NEW YORK

Public broadcasting and education should be brought closer together, says the Advisory Council of National Organizations in a report to the Corporation of Public Broadcasting. Broadcasting and education are at present "natural allies with very little rapport", the report says.

The council recommends that the corporation should try to "bridge the traditional chasm" between broadcasting and education by maintaining contact with Congress, the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, other public and private agencies and the national education organizations.

Students today include people of all ages, the report points out, including adults in continuing education or vocational education courses, as well as young children and school and college students. "Broadcasting is a common denominator" in communicating with all students, "The functionally illiterate and the post-doctoral student both understand the grammar of television."

The corporation should facilitate teacher education activities in cooperation with other agencies, to help teachers understand and use instructional media as teaching tools, and to help teachers update teaching skills by means of programmes designed for this purpose, the report recommends.

The report suggests that any educational programmes should be available on demand for educators. At present stations do not have the right to make copies of programmes for further distribution or to authorize others to make such copies but, pending passage of a new copyright law, there has been little interest in prosecution when copies have been made by broadcasters or teachers.

Public broadcasting should include the right "to record certain programmes off the air" and the right to cassette and cable distribution. "It is not reasonable to expect such rights always to be free, but it is important to establish a rational process for the acquisition at a reasonable cost."

Finally, the report recommends that the corporation encourage the development of the skills of aural visual literacy and critical listening /viewing in classroom sessions, workshops and informal training programmes.

India

from A. S. Abraham

BOMBAY

Thousands of school students in a number of Indian states have just finished or are in the process of completing the first public examination held as part of a new countrywide educational pattern. It was formulated by the Education Commission in its report published in 1966 and has finally been approved by all the provincial governments.

Education in India is a provincial responsibility and any scheme to introduce a uniform system throughout the country is necessarily a long-drawn-out affair. Only a minority of states have begun to work the system, but it is only a matter of time before all of them begin to do so.

The new pattern, commonly referred to as "10+2+3", breaks up formal education into 10 years of primary and lower secondary schooling, two years of higher secondary schooling and three years at university.

Previously, the pattern varied with some states providing for 11 years before the high school examination, others 12 years and yet others 10. The duration of university education varied likewise.

One reason for the change-over is to ensure that school-leavers and degree-holders emerge at the same time with the same set of qualifications of the same academic value throughout the country. This should make it easier for post-school institutions to admit fresh students and for employers to recruit new staff.

More importantly, the 10+2+3 pattern provides terminal points at which large numbers of students can either end their formal education and start work or carry on for a few years more in vocational courses. Only a minority of the original cohort would go to university. These points occur at the end of primary, lower secondary and higher secondary school.

The first 10 years offer, to quote the Education Commission, "a course of general education without any specialization". This includes the compulsory study of mathematics, the natural and social sciences and three languages (English, the language of the state and Hindi, the national language).

To ensure that large numbers of students at the terminal points are siphoned off, "work experience" will be an essential part of the syllabus. Although there is some vagueness about the concept, the idea seems to be to offer students a variety of courses such as servicing electrical gadgets or musical instruments, bee-keeping, woodwork, poultry farming, cane and bamboo work, and so on, which can help them to discover their aptitudes and interests and equip them with specific productive and employable skills.

If enough institutions are not set up to absorb those who leave after eight, 10 or 12 years of schooling and if enough jobs, especially in rural areas, are not created to use the skills in which students are trained, then the new system will not make an impact on the present situation marked by massive educated unemployment, overcrowding and irrelevant, theoretical syllabuses.

The 10+2+3 pattern must be seen in perspective; it will make little difference to the most serious problem of Indian education, the low enrolment and high dropout rates in schools, particularly in villages. It has been devised for those who enter and stay the course—barely 15 or 20 per cent of the total number of boys and girls in the country who should be going to and remaining in school, but don't.

Reforms are axed by President

from William Farr

M Haby: told to put on the brakes.

PARIS

The controversial plans for the reform of French education from nursery level to the end of senior secondary school have been shelved.

The announcement was made on by Friday M René Haby, Education Minister and architect of the proposals, after an hour and a half meeting with President Giscard d'Estaing.

Although the decision did not come as a complete surprise, it was only in January that the President emphasized that the reform would be one of the government's five priority measures for this year.

And last week the Ministry of Education paid for a four-page illustrated set of advertisements about the reforms in two mass-circulation teenager magazines.

Affected by the decision will be, among many other proposals, plans to lower the school starting age to five and to no longer make the baccalaureat an automatic passport to university.

Following Friday's meeting, M Haby said that the President felt that it was not possible at present to get the country to accept such fundamental reforms as had been proposed.

But the government remained convinced of the need for change, in particular in the relationship between nursery and primary schools, between general and specialized instruction at secondary school level and between general education and professional training.

M Haby said that, although there would be no comprehensive reform Bill, step-by-step changes would continue to be implemented. Some of these would only need instructions from the Ministry. Others would require legislation.

Meanwhile, the government has asked its powerful advisory body, the Economic and Social Council, to examine the prosposals and it is expected that it will recommend which should be proceeded with.

West Germany

University plans continue to face rough passage from Paul Moorman

BONN

A fresh attempt to get wide-ranging plans for the modernization of West Germany's higher education system on to the statute books is to be made in talks beginning here next week.

A University Framework Bill, which lays down common guidelines to apply to all institutions of higher education throughout the country, has been in existence since 1970.

But it has been continually blocked by either the Parliamentary Opposition or by the West German Upper House, the Bundesrat, which is made up of representatives of the 11 Länder.

In West Germany education is largely the prerogative of the states, and what Bonn calls "rationalization" or "streamlining", the Länder are regarding as efforts to transfer decision-making to the central government.

Late last year the Bill passed through the Lower House despite strong resistance from the Opposition Christian Democrats. But it was thrown out by the Upper House.

Under Parliamentary procedure the legislation is now to go before a mediation committee of both Houses, in the hope that a compromise package can be hammered out.

A nationwide university admissions policy is one of the Bill's key proposals.

Severe restrictions on admissions to many faculties are in operation in many Länder; many students are having to wait for years before getting a place; and the Abitur, the school-leaving certificate, is marked in different ways in different states, leading to anomalies in standards.

One way of speeding the progress of students through university would obviously be to fix a prescribed length of time for each course. At present, students can take virtually as long as they like.

But this is being vigorously opposed by university academics who point to the long and honourable tradition of the "eternal student" in Germany.

Their opponents say the professors are worried at the prospect that a streamlined syllabus might mean more work for them; and that courses would have to be drastically updated.

The Bill aims to provide a framework to get a consensus of opinion among experts as to what is a reasonable length of time for any particular course.

Also included in the Bill are proposals for staff representation in decision-making and changes in the present hierarchical promotion structure. The aim would be greater freedom of mobility.

So far, despite a steady succession of government compromises over the past five years, the Opposition is still resisting as strongly as ever.

If the current talks fail the legislation is expected to be shelved until the next session of Parliament.

Governing with the aid of the Free Democrats and facing an Opposition majority of one in the Upper House, the ruling Social Democrats are finding it increasingly heavy weather to get controversial policies passed into law.

This weekend sees two key Land elections. If the Social Democrats do well they could tip the scales in the Upper House and put the negotiations in a new light.

Volkswagen funds access study

The International Council for Educational Development (ICED), a private international association concerned with problems of higher education, has received a grant of DM580,000 (£100,000) from the Volkswagen Foundation to carry out a two-year comparative study of access to higher education in West Germany and the United States.

The study will be designed and managed by a German-US Study Group with Dr James Perkins, ICED chairman, serving as chairman.

The study will centre on German and US criteria and policies necessary to handle the complexities of access to higher education, an increasingly serious educational problem with growing social and political overtones.

Attention also will be given to the following closely connected problems: open access and numerus clausus; the role of high school preparation; the availability of community colleges; the nature and use of testing systems; the possibility of curricular choices; and the presence of legal and constitutional restraints, with special reference to federal systems.

The objective of the study is to provide guidelines to both institutions and governments to improve existing policies and procedures.

Sweden

by A. C. Vaigo

The Treasury is to subsidize the publication of over 300 titles of high quality literature a year, expand the library service and widen the choice of children's films.

Topping the list of grant receivers will be up to 50 volumes of Swedish prose and poetry, chiefly by new writers. Then come some 75 titles of recent foreign fiction.

In the past between 55 and 60 per cent of all fiction published in the country has been translations, nearly three quarters of them from English as against 7.8 per cent from French.

Up to 60 reissues of classics, defined as books that first appeared in the last century, will be cash-aided, too. About a third of them will be by Swedish authors.

Since many important works on major international topics have not been published in Sweden so far, mainly because of the high cost involved, the government has promised to support 25 such titles a year.

Books suitable for the younger generation will not be forgotten either—up to 100 titles (about a fifth of the current annual print in that section) will be picked for subsidy. The state will buy 1,000 copies of each and allocate them to youth organizations "for the promotion of the reading habit".

Altogether nearly £500,000 will be set aside for grants to the book publishing industry in the 1975-76 budget. A further £180,000 will be spent on buying books in immigrant languages.

The government may even support the production of an up-to-date Swedish encyclopaedia at a likely cost of more than £2m spread over a decade. Mr Bertil Zachrisson, Education Minister, is to look into the matter soon.

At least £110,000 will be used in the coming financial year for opening book-lending facilities at work-places with a labour force of 100 or more. Additional sums are expected to come from the so-called "work environment fund".

This initiative will eventually swell considerably the country's public library network, now comprising of well over 2,000 units of varying sizes and costing the taxpayer £27m a year.

Extra resources will also be made available for shooting and importing children's films—the Swedish Radio Corporation and National Film Institute will get around £200,000 for this in 1975-76. A new agency—the Children's Film Council—will be set up to coordinate the work.

Abolish 'debased and diluted' CSE

Sir,—While the authors of the latest Black Paper invite us to consider again the system of school examinations may I make one or two suggestions for the improvement of the present system.

I would give a high priority to the abolition of the CSE. This poor relation of O level serves little useful purpose and can hardly be regarded as a serious qualification in anything. Its main effect has been to ensure that debased and diluted academic courses are provided for children who have no academic interest or inclination, while some others who ought to be taking the more demanding GCE are provided with a soft alternative.

With the expensive and time-consuming activities of the CSE system out of the way the schools might be able to give some more consideration to the teaching of the sort of practical skills that these children may really need. GCE does provide, and should continue to provide, the well-established academic courses needed by academically able pupils.

Clearly some sort of national secondary examination will be needed in place of CSE. This should be a single examination, set by a single, national board and should be restricted to the very basic knowledge and skills which a child needs to face adult life. That is to say it would cover the use of English (the basic ability to communicate), calculation (arithmetic, not mathematics) and a knowledge of the laws and government of this country and of its place in the world.

There is no need for such an examination to be tied to a particular age. Bright children might take it at 12 while slow ones could take it at 16. What is important is that it would ensure that some common core syllabus, needing only a fraction of all teaching time, would be followed by all secondary pupils. The results would provide a national standard of attainment, invaluable to prospective employers, which might be included with a written final report on a national school leaving certificate.

I feel sure that this system would be of more value to all concerned than the present one. Would anyone care to support me in this?

State of the unions

Sir,—Colleges of education are being changed by the DES and are to lose their identity. The processes of change are merger, absorption, reduction, or closure.

The benefits of these changes are open to doubt. Their intention is economic more than educational. While what is good for education may remain as mute a question as ever, what is good for education college lecturers cannot remain a mute question any longer. Many are going to lose their jobs, most are going to have their conditions of service changed.

The union to which most college of education lecturers belong is the Association of Teachers in Colleges and Departments of Education. It has been a matter for concern that the ATCDE has seemed to many to be more of an instrument of the DES than a shield for lecturers. Selfless to the last ATCDE is itself to disappear.

ATCDE's will was to recommend membership transfer to the Association of Teachers in Technical Institutions.

In this unstable situation consideration should perhaps be given to the advantages of joining another union altogether, one not party to the death of the colleges of education, yet with a stated interest in academic staff. Such a one might be the Association of Scientific, Technical and Managerial Staffs, a union well used to the politics of employment reorganization.

K. R. BURNETT,
11 Stapylton Avenue,
Harborne, Birmingham.

Sir,—"It must be remembered", wrote Mr D. Elwell (April 18), "that the ATTI originated by breaking away from the NUT." A phone call would have established that the ATTI was formed in 1904 and had nothing to do with the NUT, that in 1944 a joint membership scheme was negotiated between the ATTI and the NUT which has worked to the advantage of both organizations.

A look at our conference resolutions would inform anyone that ATTI policy is not for a flat rate and only twice in the last 20 years has it advocated a flat rate in any given set of negotiations.

Mr Elwell, having made clear at an earlier stage that the APT would have nothing to do with those ATCDE members who were not in polytechnics, now comes up with the notion of a Confederation of Teachers in Higher Education. It is of interest that his organization claims no more than 4,000 members. The ATTI has over 9,000 members in polytechnics and another 5,000 at least engaged in work of Categories I, II and III outside polytechnics.

No wonder he wants a confederation. His organization is such a puny reed that if the merger recommended by the executives of ATCDE and ATTI goes through his 4,000 membership (many of them are in any case members of the ATTI) will be shown in its true light when compared with the 62,000 members of the new organization of whom over 20,000 will be in higher education. No wonder he squeals.

The merged organization will be well able to look after both the trade union and professional interests of members and the draft outline constitution which is now being considered by the ATTI and the ATCDE has been designed to that end.

TOM DRIVER,
General Secretary.

Stress pay stays

Sir,—In their letters about allowances in social priority schools (April 18), Messrs Rudge and Wadge express sentiments with which many of us would agree. But they hang their arguments on a non-existent peg, by misinterpreting NUT policy in this matter.

Our view is that much more attention will have to be given in future to positive discrimination in facilities and staffing in such schools, but we have no intention whatever of asking for allowances to be taken away from teachers who now receive them. It should also be pointed out that the NUT conference heavily defeated amendments calling for the phasing out of these allowances.

The existing scheme must be carefully reviewed as soon as possible to ensure that it is properly operated at local level in full consultation with the teachers. The difficulties that have arisen are due to the method by which the scheme was launched, i.e, a precipitate ministerial decision taken without any consultation with teachers and by passing the Burnham Committee.

Positive side of competition

Sir,—I have always regarded the business of learning and teaching to be one of cooperation; learning to read cannot be regarded as competition. Where competition is introduced into learning it is artificial; however, sports are by nature, competitive.

Sporting leagues provide us in schools with the opportunity to influence attitudes towards success and failure, winning and losing. The alternative appears to be education opting out of an important aspect of the life of our pupils, leaving the way open for them to assume that the published professional attitude is the one to emulate.

It is a mistake to equate the whole professional attitude to sport with that published image of some newspapers. Sporting leagues provide us with positive opportunities for education. They are neither positive nor negative in themselves; the use we make of them is our professional responsibility.

Why do young blacks fail?

Sir,—As a West Indian who took part in the multi-racial commission, I am deeply disappointed with your report of the NATE conference (April 11). I have no quarrel with the other aspects of the conference, but the multi-racial commission.

I feel you misunderstood the reason for our concern, because you regard genuine concern for failure of West Indian children as hostility. The fact that black delegates came from Africa, Jamaica and further afield to attend the conference was because of their grave concern for the state of abject failure of ethnic minorities in our schools. White teachers admitting it was the first time they were made to listen to black opinion says something for the success of our efforts. To term this genuine concern by black teachers as hostility is far from the truth.

You did not mention some of the demands black teachers and white alike subscribed to: that more black personnel be appointed at all levels of decision making; that more black teachers be appointed to senior posts in schools with a large number of black children; that we cannot blame the failure of these children on cultural disadvantage or language while leaving the teachers and the school system sacrosanct.

Throughout the debate about educational failure, especially among West Indians in our schools, one thing became evident: the host community (teachers) do not really understand West Indian aspirations, hopes and ambitions. Consequently the children are inadequately motivated, and cynicism among them amounts to alienation and a feeling of being unwanted and therefore a problem in our society.

Compensatory education, EPA areas and pre-schooling are seen as the panacea for what we call "disadvantaged children". Meaning that if only they were like us (middle class) there would be no problem. This is a gross misconception of the truth, and of reality.

British history: still the white man's burden

Sir,—While one may agree with many points made by Mr A. M. Dyer in his article, "Where they're at" (April 4), the main theme of which was to emphasize the need to retain the study of British history in contra-distinction to the introduction of a multi-cultural approach, he failed to establish that British history is broad enough to meet the educational requirements of a multi-racial student population.

No doubt Mr Dyer wrote with schools uppermost in mind, but as some of his arguments could be applied to further education it might be useful to recognize the shortcomings of over-concentration upon British history in the FE sector.

He argued that studies in depth should not be exchanged for the broader but more shallow work which Indian, Caribbean or African studies would entail and there is strength in this line of reasoning. Also, one must recognize his point that a study of British imperialism can lead to a clearer understanding of many attitudes prevalent in this country by students of all ethnic origins. But does the teaching of British history go far enough to overcome the difficulties encountered when opposing interpreta*tions are made of past events,* personalities and movements?

British history books frequently give scant attention to the political and economic developments which were occurring in countries whose cultures and ways of life were interrupted when trading companies and ships-of-war appeared on the scene. Today young black student-workers may regard those intruders simply as plunderers.

On the other hand, there is the "white man's burden" point of view, portraying British imperialists as laden with the responsibility of spreading Christianity and the benefits of industrial society to the deprived. And, as the situation varied in different countries, who is to say which version is nearer the truth?

One may argue that history should be studied not only to ascertain the results which accrued to Britain, but to examine the development of major changes, such as the upsetting of population balance and the foreign introduction of economic enterprises, that occurred in former colonial countries, the consequences of which are having a marked influence in Britain today. Failure to study what has occurred in these countries since the days of imperialism can help to perpetuate misunderstandings among the ethnic groups, especially where there are fundamental differences in religious beliefs and social structures.

It is all very well for Mr Dyer to contend that, as in the past, the immigrant groups will ultimately be assimilated into the hybrid British way of life. But this could be considered too mechanical in its approach, and it may be countered by the argument that the scope of history teaching should be wide enough to help to ensure that such an assimilation takes place.

PETER RICHARDS,
Head of department
Slough College of Technology.

Sir,—A. M. Dyer (April 4) misses the point and purpose of the need for innovation and change in the curriculum in the multi-racial school serving a multi-racial society. British society is no longer a homogenous society (one is aware of the argument of the Romans, Angles, Saxons and Normans). Immigrants no longer come only from the European countries but from the new Commonwealth and other areas. They are no longer predominantly white but are black and brown.

Whereas previous immigrants differed from the host community mainly in culture and language, and were easily absorbed, this is unlikely to be true of the present immigrants. British society is reared on a premise that presupposes immigrants' inferiority, based on colour, and a myth of their limitation in areas other than the physical and artistic. Educationists and others are largely agreed that these attitudes should be demolished if particular ethnic groups are to be integrated, and if the host community are to demonstrate their readiness for such a process.

Mr Dyer appears to see ethnocentricity as a new-fangled expression not to be taken seriously. From my knowledge of one particular group of immigrants—West Indians—I am convinced that ethnocentricity is developing at a rate that would cause concern to anyone interested in the development of this society. If one considers the implication of the ethnocentricity developing within particular groups it would seem that any influence that can reduce this would be beneficial.

The writer's anxiety that any attempt to broaden the school syllabus in a multi-cultural context should not be at the expense of British history seems to be overstated. It is not envisaged that the place of British history would ever be diminished, far less relegated to second place.

Mr Dyer seems obsessed about the intrinsic value of the study of British history, but doesn't seem to think that a similar value exists in the teaching of the history of other ethnic groups, especially those contributing immigrants to our population. He is mistaken in suggesting that such studies will only explain to pupils where their parents lived and not "Help them to understand where they are themselves". Such studies will demonstrate that there is a perspective, other than a British point of view. They will also promote the insights and understanding necessary for a stable and healthy multi-ethnic society, and show that immigrants have an identity and background of their own.

Side-by-side solution for direct grants

Sir,—As headmaster of a direct grant school which has been in receipt of grant since 1902, I welcome Stuart Maclure's study of the United States comprehensive system and his suggestions for a way out of our present impasse (April 18). It is surely time for fresh thinking and fresh initiatives.

Mr Maclure proposes comprehensive state schooling until the age of 14, after which time pupils should be free to pursue different routes. "Any scheme", he wrote, "which would enable the direct grant schools (albeit modified) to remain available (as 14-plus institutions) to pupils from the maintained system deserves to be seriously considered. By any standards it will be crazy if Mr Prentice, a crusader on behalf of the maintained schools, is responsible for making half the direct grants go independent and closing down some of the remainder."

Here in Bedford the Harpur Trust concluded in 1971 an agreement with the county to cooperate with their new three-tier comprehensive system by accepting free place pupils at 13 instead of 11, widening the ability range of entry, and resorting to random selection by computer to avoid creaming the new l.e.a. upper schools. This agreement was welcomed by all the teaching organizations.

In effect we have guided parental choice. On the strength of this agreement we built a new school at the cost of £1.7m which was opened in April, 1974. In September we and our sister school each received a first 13-plus entry of 60 pupils. The experiment is a great success.

Mr Prentice said in an interview that it was anomalous if the state paid a special subsidy to schools which declined to play a part in the comprehensive organization of their areas. We have not declined. We are playing our part and only want to go on doing so.

Mr Maclure's proposals, if modified to admit a transfer age of 13, might well apply in Bedfordshire and elsewhere. One welcomes the Secretary of State's reported assurance that he will not prevent local authorities continuing to take up places in (former) direct grant schools.

Pause now for reflections on the four-term year

Sir,—The NUT document, "The Pattern of the School Year", was issued in the belief that discussion on possible reforms would be helpful in two particular respects.

First, the report of the working party is probably the most comprehensive document on the subject issued south of the Scottish border. It examines both the educational and social components in the debate although it is unashamedly stated that educational considerations should be pre-eminent. For this reason alone it should sharpen discussion and elevate debate to a national level.

Second, it proposes that a national pattern should be established which best meets the often conflicting needs of children, teachers and others in very local situations. I feel that your correspondents Messrs. Curtis and Whitley (March 28) should consider these factors carefully.

If Mr Curtis studies the document he should note that only one of the four preferred schemes put forward by the working party would mean "two separate four-week holidays" in the summer months. The other three proposals for one holiday of five or six weeks will surely allow his wife and himself ample time for holidays abroad. The working party document states: "Many teachers regard the long holiday of some six weeks as a very necessary break, permitting a 'winding-down' after the school year as well as time to explore other interests."

I hope that Mr and Mrs Curtis will consider, however, the points of the "four plus four pattern", which offers the possibility of two somewhat shorter breaks in the fair weather months.

It is misleading to suggest that any of the possible reforms proposed deprive teachers of time. The central concern is the reallocation of time to the best advantage. This leads me to the underlying assumption in Michael Whitley's letter that the "average child" requires sustained work presumably for periods of up to 16 weeks without a substantial break: I would not contest that for some children this is the most appropriate solution—but what proportion is this?

The document mentions these children (paragraph 14) as well as the very young, the anti-social and handicapped about whom there is possibly less debate. Equally we are concerned with the rhythm of the school which is extremely discordant at present in this country.

The plain fact is that we need to establish the best balance of advantage for all concerned, weighting the needs of pupils higher than other groups. We state that no pattern can meet completely the needs of all children. However, this does not mean we should despair and rest upon the status quo.

The line of inquiry and resultant recommendations of the working party might not be perfect—certainly some teachers would be less happy with reform—but during the next year the NUT will test and monitor reaction. I feel certain, however, that this exercise would be most fruitful if the document is read and accorded some time for reflection.

W. ROY,
Chairman,
NUT working party on the pattern of the school year.

Innocent pursuit of political literacy

Sir,—Tom Howarth's scepticism on the value of the Programme for Poli*tical Education (April 11) seems* to be based on two errors of fact and a number of misconceptions.

The errors of fact may be quickly disposed of: first, the Programme for Political Education is not in "the School Council's warming-pan". It is led by a team of interested people who formulated the idea, funded by the Nuffield Foundation and administered by the Han*sard Society for Parliamentary* Government and the University of York. The Politics Association the professional body of Politics teachers, is closely associated with the Working Party.

Second, the programme is not based solely on Professor Bernard Crick although, as chairman of the working party, he has obviously played an important part in its deliberations and preliminary papers. There are a number of people from a variety of backgrounds serving on the working party who have been drawn together by their common concern for the level of political education in our society.

Mr Howarth's misconceptions seem to be derived from his extrapolation of a curricular end-product from the important strategic papers which have been produced to provide a unifying framework within which the various groups working within the programme may operate. He has assumed—and a more careful reading of Document No 1 would have put him right—that the intention is to introduce a new "subject" into the curriculum in place of other, in his view worthier, studies, such as history.

This is simply not the case. What is intended is that the aim of political literacy shall be pursued through the teaching of a number of aspects of the existing curricu*lum, which, of course, varies enorm*ously from school to school. Groups within the working party are looking, for instance, at the use which can be made of the political content of the teaching of history and English. So far from banishing Clarkson, Wilberforce or Robert Owen from the classroom, the Programme for Political Education may find new ways of using historical and other material as a part of political education.

The most important of Mr. Howarth's misconceptions is his almost wilful assumption that the encouragement of participation is a recipe for squatters, flying pickets and demonstrators. These forms of political activity may often represent the very opposite of what the programme is all about which, in this context, calls for "a more vigorous tolerance of real views and real behaviour". A politically motivated person should be equipped to act politically in the most effective manner related to his ends with a full and proper regard for the opinions and claims of others.

Many of those who await the outcome of this important curriculum project with the greatest interest are deeply concerned at the level of political illiteracy achieved in our educational system. Most young people in our schools and colleges are turned out into a world which presents highly complex and sophisticated political problems without any sort of educational equipment to deal with them.

Although it does have wider implications, the Programme for Political Education may be said to be one of the important consequences of the lowering of the voting age to 18 and the realization that we are doing virtually nothing to prepare young people for exercising even the minimal responsibility of voting.

Mr Howarth would have done well to have taken a less personalized look at what the programme is seeking to achieve and, unless he is completely satisfied with the present level of political education, he might have made a more constructive and more welcome contribution to the continuing discussions on this vital topic.

J. S. SUTTON,
Chairman,
The Politics Association.

Those Black Paper blues

Sir,—What a relief to read a positive and even optimistic piece about comprehensive education. Mrs Kathleen Mitchell's article (April 18) was desperately needed and should be quoted widely.

It seems to me that the Black paper—incidentally, what an idiotic, melodramatic title—panders to all that is wrong, not only in education but in attitudes towards children and encourages the great divide between children and grown-ups. The Black Paper says that "children are not naturally good . . ." meaning, by definition, that adults are.

There is something obscene about this publication which could very soon turn it into the pornography of education. To read it gives one the eerie feeling that nothing has changed and that somewhere, not very far away, Victorian attitudes are flourishingly alive and well.

Mrs Mitchell's article sheds considerable light on what goes on in comprehensive schools and the problems to be faced and how they should be tackled. It comes as a necessary antidote to the wholesale destructive criticism which feeds on ignorance and fear, fear of exchanging the old, familiar patterns for new ones and basic ignorance of what these patterns represent.

The Black Paper is for parents, not for children, and this is only one of the areas where it goes hopelessly and horribly wrong.

Come back, Lord Houghton

Sir,—May I suggest a solution to the latest teachers' salary deadlock? Reconvene Houghton.

I assume that all the arguments made by the various organizations last summer are still fundamentally the same. Therefore all Houghton need receive are statements from each of the teachers' organizations and the management of their proposals for fair salaries, and details of the present salaries paid in the jobs/professions looked at by Houghton last year. Houghton can then apply its parameters and collected knowledge, assess the information and within a couple of days propose the April, 1975 salary scales.

Mothers who want to work

Sir,—Gillian Pinkerton (April 11) while questioning some of the assumptions of the playgroup movement, seems to have made a few assumptions of her own. Chief among these is that Hilde Jarecki's book, Playgroups: A Practical Approach, speaks for PPA.

Hilde Jarecki is undoubtedly one of the pioneers of the playgroup movement and has made a vital contribution to development in Inner London, but her book is entirely her own. PPA span the width of society, and while many members may disapprove, along with Hilde Jarecki, of mothers who go out to work, others do not and the association itself is committed to helping all parents and children, including working mothers.

I would also challenge Gillian Pinkerton about her assumptions that "the philosophy of the playgroup movement has remained more or less unchanged in its 14 years of existence". Though the support of families providing playgroups for their children remains PPA's main work, its aims and objectives have changed a good deal since early days, and new aims were adopted by the membership at the 1974 annual meeting which specifically extended PPA's work into areas beyond playgroups. Furthermore, a national adviser with a particular interest in special needs is a recent appointment, and PPA's special needs committee considers ways of channelling help to childminders, factory creches, and day care centres.

PPA accept that women not only must, but want, to go out to work, that fathers should play an equal part in their children's lives, and that playgroups are not the final answer for everyone.

JEAN BROWN,
Pre-school Playgroups Association.

This 'revolution' keeps the poor in their place

Sir,—In your leading article "Cultural Revolution from the World Bank" (Feb 28) you describe the World Bank's new aims, "to forget about Western systems of education . . . concepts such as that of the whole man which underpin them, and to think in terms of basic education, literacy programmes and so on", as presupposing a "kind of cultural revolution".

It is apparent to me, though, from the Southern African context, that it is nothing of the kind; and that the World Bank's ideas, in fact, bear a remarkable similarity to the "Bantu" education policy already in force in the Republic of South Africa.

The distinctive feature of this policy is that blacks should be educated only in so far as is convenient for their role and station in life within the system of apartheid, within their radically circumscribed employment and earning capacities. In other words, its aim is to prevent the discontent inevitably caused when there are large numbers of well-educated (in the "Western" sense, whatever that is) but un- or under-employed black people around.

Perhaps, though, it should be considered that the creation of discontent is one of the primary duties of educators in an unjust world—to open the eyes of young people to injustice, whether in the national context in Southern Africa, or in international relations in other developing countries.

This procedure is inevitably expensive, and perhaps also runs the danger of elitism for that reason. Yet I would suggest that it is basically less elitist than the World Bank's "cultural revolution", which would give minimal skills to the poor, while allowing the children of the rich, of government officials and ministers, to find "Western" education in such schools as Waterford in Swaziland.

Too much 'playing at PE' in schools

The modern tendency, especially among older pupils, casually to "play at" a wide range of optional activities is causing serious professional concern, says a report by a working party of the British Association of Organizers and Lecturers in Physical Education.

The shift from the educational to the recrtational in PE curricula identified in 1970 by the Schools Council inquiry, is becoming increasingly prominent in all types of secondary school.

"This trend is not in the best interests of either the pupils or the subject." In far too many cases it has resulted in a loss of quality and depth.

Factors which have contributed to the increase of the recreational element include deficiencies in the education and training of some teachers of PE, problems arising from changes in secondary education relating to the age of transfer, increased school population, RSLA and the increased number of activities now available through the expansion of facilities.

Colleges offering main courses in physical education "are mistaken when they attempt to provide too wide-ranging courses". As in schools, the increased number of courses is often achieved only at the expense of time and depth.

They recommend that college courses should be designed to encourage students to formulate their own PE philosophy, that a core practical programme should be comprised of gymnastics/dance, swimming, athletics, a basic "common core" games course embracing such principles as organization, facility use, small side team games and developmental planning, one winter game, one summer game.

The remainder of the practical programme should be made up of indepth study of a limited number of optional courses which would be chosen from a range of activities offered according to staff expertise. No course would be considered adequate unless it involved a minimum of 10 hours tuition.

The essential element of any practical course should be the understanding of methods whereby a teacher endeavours to present the required skills to children.

In schools, they say, all pupils, "at the very least for the first two years of secondary education", should be provided with a sound basic programme of gymnastics/dance, swimming athletics and major games. Diversification could take place later.

A report by another working party on training in physical education for primary school teachers says that the DES needs to share their concern and be more positive in stating the place of physical education in the primary school.

"We believe that it should state not only the areas of training which will best equip teachers to do their work but should strongly recommend that all primary school students should undertake a course in the teaching of physical education."

Why Banbury supply more than one third of Britain's squash courts

'Excellent revenue earners—and negligible maintenance costs!'
—says Geoffrey Bennett, Recreation Officer for the County Borough of Warley.

Warley County Borough's two Banbury Squash Courts have been such a smash-hit success that the installation is shortly to be doubled to four.

Nearly two-fifths of capital outlay was recovered in one year alone—and expenditure was less than £500. All this in addition to giving a service much in demand by the citizens of Warley, and to the local schools, who use the courts during off-peak hours in mid-morning and mid-afternoon.

Banbury modular Squash Courts cost only about half as much as conventional brick courts—and can be erected in 6-8 weeks on a prepared base. The playing walls are guaranteed to an accuracy of 1/32nd of an inch over the entire 32 feet length of the playing wall. Furthermore, while replastering can put a conventional court out of commission for several weeks, this is not required with Banbury Courts.

'Better playing characteristics' says Jonah Barrington.

"When Banbury asked me to help design the ideal squash court, I was able to suggest the best features of the many courts I've played in. Banbury has them all. Playing surface, flooring, lighting, anti-condensation and maintenance-free qualities put them way ahead of any other court. I cannot fault them."

Danny Nightingale: Sights on the 1980 Olympics.

Pentathlon juniors shock the seniors

The British junior pentathlon team, who have experienced more than a taste of success recently, excelled themselves by taking third place in a top level adult competition, the Skol International at the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, at the weekend.

As host country, Great Britain entered two adult teams plus the juniors "just for experience". It came as a pleasant surprise for the boys, Danny Nightingale, Peter Wall, Nigel Clark and Mike Mumford, when they finished with a total of 14,149 points, less than 100 behind the West German adult team who came second. Hungary, with 14,949, were the winners.

With so many skills involved, it is difficult to fit in sufficient training in each. Peter Wall, as a Sandhurst cadet, is perhaps best placed. Danny Nightingale, reigning junior champion, who is 20, is following a business studies course and has to fit his training round his studies, as does Nigel Clark, who is at St Albans College of Building and fits in swimming before breakfast, running at lunchtime and the other sports in the evenings and at weekends.

Nigel's interest began in a Pony Club, where he was introduced to the tetrathlon. He has never looked back.

In the short term the boys are training hard for the Swedish International in June and for selection for the junior world championships in Montreal in August. More distant sights are the 1980 Olympics.

What the polys need

Every polytechnic ought to have professional physical education staff, says a survey made for the Association of Polytechnic Physical Education Lecturers by their team in Liverpool.

For every 1,000 students they should also have three football pitches, one indoor sports hall, and 2.52 squash courts as well as other "facilities".

Five of the 31 polytechnics which took part in the survey have no physical education departments. They are City of London, South Bank, Brighton, Glamorgan and Portsmouth.

In those which have physical education departments the average staffing ratio of 1.65 a 1,000 students is below the recommended level of 2.67 "for the present inadequate facilities" and well below the ideal 3.3 a 1,000 in the best equipped establishments.

The findings are based on questionnaires sent to presidents of students unions, rectors and heads of Physical Education departments by Dr Vaughan Thomas, Liverpool's director of Physical Education (and secretary of APPEL) and his colleagues, Mr Thomas Reilly and Mr Norman Fox.

There is a difference of opinion about the order of priorities, the Physical Education staffs wanting greater emphasis on academic courses than the presidents and rectors.

The biggest difference is over who should have responsibility for sport and recreation. Presidents say it should be the students, Physical Education heads favour the polys. The rectors are evenly divided.

Dr Thomas and his colleagues do not back any of the camps. They accept the realities and suggest ways of striking a balance to avoid political conflicts.

The survey, the first to examine the PE needs of polytechnics, says it "has demonstrated beyond reasonable doubt that sport and recreation should form one part of the total educational provision. . . The fact that recreation is voluntary ought not to jeopardise the ability of polytechnics to cater for the demand which this survey has revealed."

Winning walkers

West Midlands' schools won four of the six team prizes and two of the individual events at the national schools race walking championships at Sheffield at the weekend. Their victories include the first three home in the senior girls' race: S. Wish, E. Smith and K. Frost.

The junior girls' individual race, won by J. Wickham, and the team trophies for the intermediate girls and senior boys were all picked up by the West Midlands, one of the new hybrids in schools athletics.

The other individual winners were Y. Rowe, of Derbyshire, intermediate girls; I. MacConn (Northumberland), junior boys; Pope (Sussex), intermediate boys; G. Augrove, of Warwickshire, senior boys. The Essex team was best in the junior boys and Leicestershire in the intermediate range.

In brief

£1m for boys' clubs

The National Association of Boys' Clubs are to spend £1m on a development programme, which includes plans to recruit and train leaders, to refurbish existing clubs and to build new ones in areas where they are urgently needed.

For trade unionists

A two-year evening school in labour studies and industrial relations intended primarily for practising trade unionists starts in September at the school of social sciences and business studies, Polytechnic of Central London.

More say for students

Students nominated by the Central Consultative Committee and the Students' Association, the equivalent of a students' union, will be members of nine important Open University committees: admissions, courses, examinations and assessment, financial awards, post-experience courses, post-experience students, students' progress, summer school and tutorial committee.

Movement exam

The British Association of Teachers of Dancing, by arrangement with the Cleveland Education Authority, held their first examination in dramatic movement for drama students at the Stockton-Billingham Technical College this week.

Prizes for magazine

ILEA Contact, the colour magazine sent each week to the ILEA's 43,000 teachers won first prize for the best colour cover for a colour magazine in an international section of this year's annual editorial and design competition sponsored by the British Association of Industrial Editors. It filled two second places, in the house journal class for magazines with a circulation over 17,000 and in the class for the best single colour picture.

Health in the tropics

Mrs Judith Hart, Minister of Overseas Development, has approved a grant of £300,000 to the Liverpool School of Tropical Medicine towards the cost of building a wing to house the new department of tropical child health under the direction of Dr R. G. Hendrickse. The Ministry will also make an annual grant of up to £65,400 for seven years towards the running costs of the department.

Political records

Sources in British Political History 1900-1951, Volume I, compiled by a team led by Dr Chris Cook, senior research officer of the British Library of Political and Economic Science, and published this week by Macmillan, is a guide to the archives of political parties, societies, trades unions, institutions and pressure groups which were active in British politics between 1900 and 1951. More than a thousand organizations are listed.

People

Dr T. M. Sugden, vice-chairman and chief executive of Shell Research, and Director, Thornton Research Centre, elected Master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, from January 1 1976. Before joining Shell in 1963 Dr Sugden was reader in physical chemistry at Cambridge and a fellow of Queens' College.

Appointments

Schools

Mr Christopher Jones, a peripatetic teacher for children with hearing impairment, based in Peterborough, to be head of the ILEA Penbury Grove residential school for the deaf, High Wycombe, Buckinghamshire.

Mr Grafton Oates, acting head of Kelvin Grove Junior School, Sydenham, London, to be head.

Universities

Professor J. F. Lively, fellow and tutor in politics at St Peter's College, Oxford, to a professorship in the department of economics, Warwick University, from October 1975.

People's history

by Raphael Samuel

In February, 1852, the young men of the Watlington Mutual Improvement Society, Berkshire, after seven nights of what an enthusiastic secretary described as "the most important debate" that had ever taken place in the society's history, decided, by a majority of members present, that, with the exception of "sometimes allowing his religion to degenerate into enthusiasm" and of "unwisely" consenting to the execution of the King, "Oliver Cromwell was nevertheless a 'better Christian', a 'more noble minded spirit', a 'greater warrior' and a 'more con-ent man' than had 'scarcely ever appeared in the face of the earth'".

This kind of debate, in which historical questions were taken up with debaters on either side, was a staple fare at the lecture-rooms, working men's clubs and halls of science of the nineteenth century, and they may serve as a reminder of the way in which history at that time was a living issue, shaping people's consciousness of themselves, their society and the struggles in which they were engaged.

The spirit in which it was discussed was critical, rather than didactic. History was a vehicle for moral argument and political debate. It gave definition to the categories of social science and provided the crucible in which opinions and commitments were formed. History was not a subject by itself, but a tool.

It is a curious fact that the institutionalization of history as a teaching subject, first in the universities, then in the schools, has gone hand in hand with the withdrawal from the battle of ideas, and a progressive narrowing of its influence in society at large. In the nineteenth century (as readers of Marx's Das Kapital are immediately made aware) the economist or the sociologist was necessarily a historian too, while historians stepped eagerly into the arenas of controversy.

Today, by contrast, history is essentially a subject for the specialist, and its problematic comes from within. The general reader is more likely to turn to it for entertainment than for illustrations of an unfolding moral drama, while the great mass of historical writing remains the preserve of the profession. Sociology rather than history provides a framework for political and moral debate and the historical dimension is discarded in favour of the symmetries of social science.

The decline of history may partly be attributed to the progress of the profession and the inbreeding and sectarianism to which it gives rise. The fact that some subjects get more attention from historians than others—and some, like childhood, almost none—is no testimony by itself to their comparative importance, but may have more to do with the way in which research is organized and shaped. Too often its context is the enclosed world in which the "new" interpretation may count for more than the substantive importance of the subject, or the way in which it contributes to a wider understanding of society.

Fashion may direct the gaze of historians; a new methodology may excite them; or they may stumble on an untapped source. But whatever the particular focus—whether gaps to be filled or an established view to be challenged—they will be working within an existing frame of inquiry, respecting its limits, however chafing, and eschewing any suggestion of social or political bias. It is historiography which provides the measure of significance, not life.

History in the classroom reflects the narrowness of these preoccupations. The nearer its gets to modern times, the more fragmented it is likely to become. The child may start with ancient or medieval history, in which societies are seen as a whole, but by the time it gets to the nineteenth century the canvas is likely to be filled by a miscellany of apparently unrelated events, with chronology as the only link between them. Original documents may be introduced to add some local colour, but they do not, of themselves, unify understanding. Indeed they may make the past more remote instead of bringing it nearer.

The same may be said of scholarly controversy. The A level student, like the university undergraduate, is encouraged to show familiarity with its tendencies, but instead of providing a principle of order it may be simply a late addition to those many hurdles which test the athletic skills of the competitive examinee.

Project work, though liberating history from the tyranny of the textbooks, can reinforce its inward-looking tendencies if it is treated as an exercise in method rather than as a stimulus to wider and more open-ended inquiry. The study of enclosure awards is not necessarily more illuminating than an epitome of the Great Reform Bill, or the provisions of the Congress of Vienna, even though it has the merit of being closer to the ground. It is not only the choice of subject which limits historians, but often the sources to which they are tied. In a county record office, for instance, the working classes, through no fault of the archivist, are largely unrepresented by documents, but have to be seen through the eyes of intermediaries. The chief medieval documents to survive are the manorial court rolls, while in more modern times there are estate papers, solicitors' accumulations, business records and a huge number of conveyances, wills and deeds, which take up page after page in the catalogues.

In the quarter sessions records, which form the original nucleus of many CRO collections, it is the more bureaucratic type of document which tend to be preserved; indictments, for instance, which give a formal statement of offences, but no details. The "human" ones—the depositions which give the transcript of evidence in individual cases—have either vanished or been thinned out. Workhouse records are also administrative in bias. Well over 200 different classes of nineteenth-century Poor Law documents are said to exist, but hopeful researchers who make their way into the muniment room of a town hall or library are likely to find that only the minute books of higher committees and bound volumes of accounts survive.

The question of sources is important because they can, of themselves, push work in a certain direction, and give it an unarticulated bias which has to be recognized, if it is to be successfully resisted. The magistrate's clerk, or the police officer, guides researchers on their journey into crime, the senior partner takes them by the arm when they look at business, the temperance advocate leads them in and out of the pubs. Unless they are careful, historians may end up as their mouthpieces.

The History Workshop* volumes have taken shape in a rather different way. Instead of taking our cue from the state of the archives or the more or less chance configurations of academic controversy and research we have been guided, in the first place, by the intrinsic interest and importance of our subjects, as fundamental elements in social life—work and class relations, popular culture and education, childhood and family life, sex roles and marriage. The volumes attempt to bring history closer to the central concerns of people's lives and to offer examples of what a people's history is, or might be, about.

At hop-picking time the whole family could be employed—some more actively than others. An undated scene from Village Life and Labour.

The writing of such a history is a matter both of using new sources and of treating old ones in a different way. Oral history has seemed to us particularly important, not only as a supplementary resource (to "fill in gaps" where printed or manuscript records are silent), but also because it makes it possible, at least for recent times, to redefine the subject of historical inquiry.

The history of education is a prime example. Instead of having to rely on the spare entries of the school logbooks—with their standardized, repetitive forms—or on the reports of HMIs and Parliamentary Commissioners, it is possible to launch a much more wide-ranging inquiry into the relationship of family, school and home (the subject of two of the History Workshop volumes), to speak of the child's experience of school, as well as of the administrative hand which shaped it, and to look in detail at the way in which schooling helped to inculcate behaviour and to stereotype class and sex roles.

Or again on work (the subject of five of the volumes), instead of refracting labour conditions through the pages of the factory inspectors, or the numbered question and answer form of Parliamentary inquiry, it is possible to write at length about the inner life of the workplace, and to see industrial relations not only at head office, as recorded in the minute books of trade union executives, but at the point of production.

Similarly, in the discussion of family and marriage, it is possible to go beyond the head count of the census returns and parish registers, and to speak of family relationships rather than household size—the competition for love and authority in the family, the allocation of household duties, the relationship of dependants and providers.

Local history too—that great stand-by of the Workers Educational Association class and the school project—can be defined in a more generous way. Instead of being imprisoned by the parish chest, on whose limited contents some three generations of local historian have been reared, it is possible to look at community life as a whole, and to map its underlife as well as the activities of parish officers. (The essay on Headington Quarry in Village Life and Labour is one attempt to show how this might be done.) All this is not a matter of exalting one kind of evidence, oral history, at the expense of another, the written word, but of enriching the subject of historical inquiry by setting up a dialectical interplay

Another ambition of the workshop is to make history a more democratic activity and to break down the hierarchical divisions which segregate teaching and research. The workshop began as an attack on the examination system and the humiliations which it imposed on adult students. It was an attempt to encourage working men and women to write their own history, instead of leaving it to the academy or allowing it to be lost; to become producers as well as consumers in their learning; and to bring their own experience to bear upon the records of the past. It has developed as a loose collaboration of full-time historians and worker-scholars, partly in small groups, partly in large meetings, the ninth of which—on Britain Between the Wars, 1920-1940—is being held at Oxford this weekend.

The workshop has been associated, from the start with the Oral History Society and it has enjoyed a fraternal association with the Society for the Study of Labour History, even though its biases and focus of attention are not always the same. Another close association has been with the women's movement, whose members have been present in force at workshop meetings (the first national women's conference, held at Ruskin in 1969, was convened by a group of women who had come together, as a critical faction, at the History Workshop of the previous year), and whose perspectives have helped to shape the contents of the workshop volumes.

From next winter we shall be publishing a journal, which we hope will bring scholarship and teaching closer together. In it we will discuss critically the use of archives and sources, and relate teaching methods to the wider purposes which history can serve. We hope that it will be of service to the cause of history in the schools, and that teachers will share their experience and their enthusiasm with us.

The first of 12 volumes in the History Workshop Series*, Village Life and Labour, edited by Raphael Samuel, was published yesterday by Routledge and Kegan Paul, £6.95; paperback, £3.50.

The big match

Barry Hines, who wrote Kestrel for a Knave, recalls his experience of football at school

Barry Hines' games master in action in Kes, " as clean and shining as a boy down for breakfast on his seaside holidays ".

I've never played a game of football in my life. I've always played in matches. I was brought up in an area dominated by professional football clubs—Barnsley, Sheffield, Rotherham, Doncaster, Huddersfield, Leeds. There were no prominent amateur clubs to watch, so my attitudes were formed on the terraces at Oakwell, Hillsborough and Bramall Lane.

There were hundreds of local football teams around, but these were never amateurs either. Not in spirit anyway. They were composed of lads who were aspiring to be professionals, or men who hadn't made it. The game was never the thing. Only the winning. The only good matches were the ones you won. It was as simple as that.

At grammar school they thought differently. They even wasted part of the field on a pitch which had funny markings and two flag poles stuck at each end. I still think there is something unsatisfactory about rugby posts. There is no real end to them for a start. If you kick the ball five miles high and the referee judges that it would have gone between the posts then it's a goal.

But even then it is not a real goal, is it? Real goals are under the cross-bar. And they have nets. I can never get worked up when I see a rugby player taking a penalty kick, no matter how far the distance, or how narrow the angle. After all, he only has to kick the ball over the bar, and there's nobody trying to stop it at that.

Footballers do this all the time and get jeered and cursed for it, even though they are running with the ball, or being tackled, or being blocked by a wall of players standing five yards away instead of ten. No, if there was a goalkeeper up there between the posts, suspended by balloons, or with a helicopter strapped to his back, I might be able to take it more seriously.

I even find the markings on a football pitch satisfying; their symmetry, the matching halves of boxes and curves. It is as pleasing to the eye as the doubles in dominoes. I'm surprised no artist has painted a football pitch yet, just the white lines on a green background. Hanging in a gallery nothing else would get a look in. There would be a crowd round it all day long just waiting for the teams to come out.

At grammar school they also tried to convince me that football was not really important, that games lessons were merely half-time breaks between the academic rigours of the week. But what they did not understand was that I was not an academic boy. All I wanted was to be a professional footballer. Football and running were the only things I was any good at.

At school I lived from games lessons to Saturday morning matches, year in, year out. The agonies I've sat through staring out of the window hoping that the fog would clear, or the rain would stop before the games lesson. The weeks that have been ruined when the teacher has said that the weather was too inclement and we would have to go into a classroom and have a quiz.

There's a grammar school teacher's word for you, inclement. When we couldn't play at home it was because it was pissing it down.

We didn't play in leagues either. There were no cups and we couldn't play for the district team. That was only for the local secondary modern school lads. This used to infuriate and frustrate me, the way we were supposed to regard ourselves as above this kind of competition.

Why did they want to make us feel superior? Just because I sat down one morning when I was 10 years old and got a few more sums right than my mates seemed no reason for trying to make me into a snob. Yet, this is what they tried to do. Not overtly, but the very existence of the school meant they had no choice.

Like the public school, the grammar school exists to perpetuate the class divisions within our society. They are middle class institutions which try to seduce the working class student into their ranks.

They failed with me. When my mates left secondary modern school at 15, I wanted to leave with them. I applied to the local pit for a job as an apprentice mining surveyor. I didn't want to be a surveyor, but it seemed a respectable sort of job; I would be on the staff. Even I wasn't immune from all the indoctrination that was taking place around me.

The chief surveyor said: You need O levels for this job. Go back to school and get some. So I went back and got some. And when I knew the rainfall on the Pampas and Gladstone's foreign policy, they employed me as an apprentice mining surveyor.

I stuck it for six months. At the time I was playing for Wolves Juniors. The matches were on Saturday mornings. Unfortunately I was supposed to work Saturday mornings. So I had no choice. I had to give up my job.

I went back to school and decided to become a PE teacher. I thought that if I didn't make it as a professional footballer, then teaching physical education would be the next best thing. Like football, I didn't regard it as work. I didn't want to be a teacher. To my mind they were on a par with the police, agents of repression. No, it just seemed like a very pleasant way of perpetuating my adolescence.

I think this is one of the reasons why I never made it though. I took out an insurance policy. I wanted something to fall back on. I was a decent player, but I would have been a lot better if the only alternatives had been the track at Fords, or working all three shifts down the pit like my dad.

It was while I was in the sixth form that something very significant happened to me. I was chosen to attend the Schools Week at Cambridge. About one hundred of the supposedly best grammar school and public school footballers were picked to take part in a series of trial matches, the aim being to find the best team to play Scotland under-eighteens.

I went down on the train from Sheffield full of myself. I was seventeen, fit, fast, strong and reasonably skilful. I was captain of the school team, I was playing for Yorkshire Grammar Schools, and several league clubs were interested in me. A Manchester United scout had been to our house, and this was at the time of the great team, just before the Munich disaster.

I went down in my suit—I was a semi-Ted at the time—drape jacket, tight trousers, crew cut, D.A. When I saw those public school boys I couldn't believe it. They didn't seem to have heard of fashion. They were all dressed in flannels and sports jackets with sloping haircuts. They would have looked well in the officers' mess in a British war film. Nigel Patrick would have been their commanding officer.

But it was when we talked together that I really felt the difference. They were so articulate and so assured. They had a collective air of massive superiority that staggered me. And suddenly I didn't want to talk; I was embarrassed by my thick Barnsley accent. I was even embarrassed by my clothes; I was a northern herbert in yellow socks and bumpers. They tolerated me. After all, they were too well bred to be rude, but all the time I felt I was being politely patronized.

Disraeli was wrong when he talked about two nations. It is more like two worlds.

The only place I could match them was on the football pitch. I didn't have to say very much there. Some of them were good players, but even the best lacked the urgency and determination of the working class grammar school boys. But then, what had they to be urgent about? Football was not important in their lives. For them it really was a game.

They had more studied destinations. They were from wealthy influential families, they were destined for Oxford and Cambridge, and then positions which would in turn ensure and perpetuate the wealth and influence of their own class. What was the tawdry glam of football, compared to the stea power and affluence they were ing to achieve?

I began to realize that playing Barnsley for £20 a week wasn't real big-time after all. It was a pot, a mere diversion, compared that other world that I was getting a sniff at for the first ti

I made the England team watched every match I did not p in to assess all the other wing-ha on the course. There was only danger for my position, a boy fr a southern independent gram school. But he got injured. I w glad. He was no better than me, b he might have been picked bec he looked more respectable, and would certainly have known how speak to the waiters better in hotel in Glasgow.

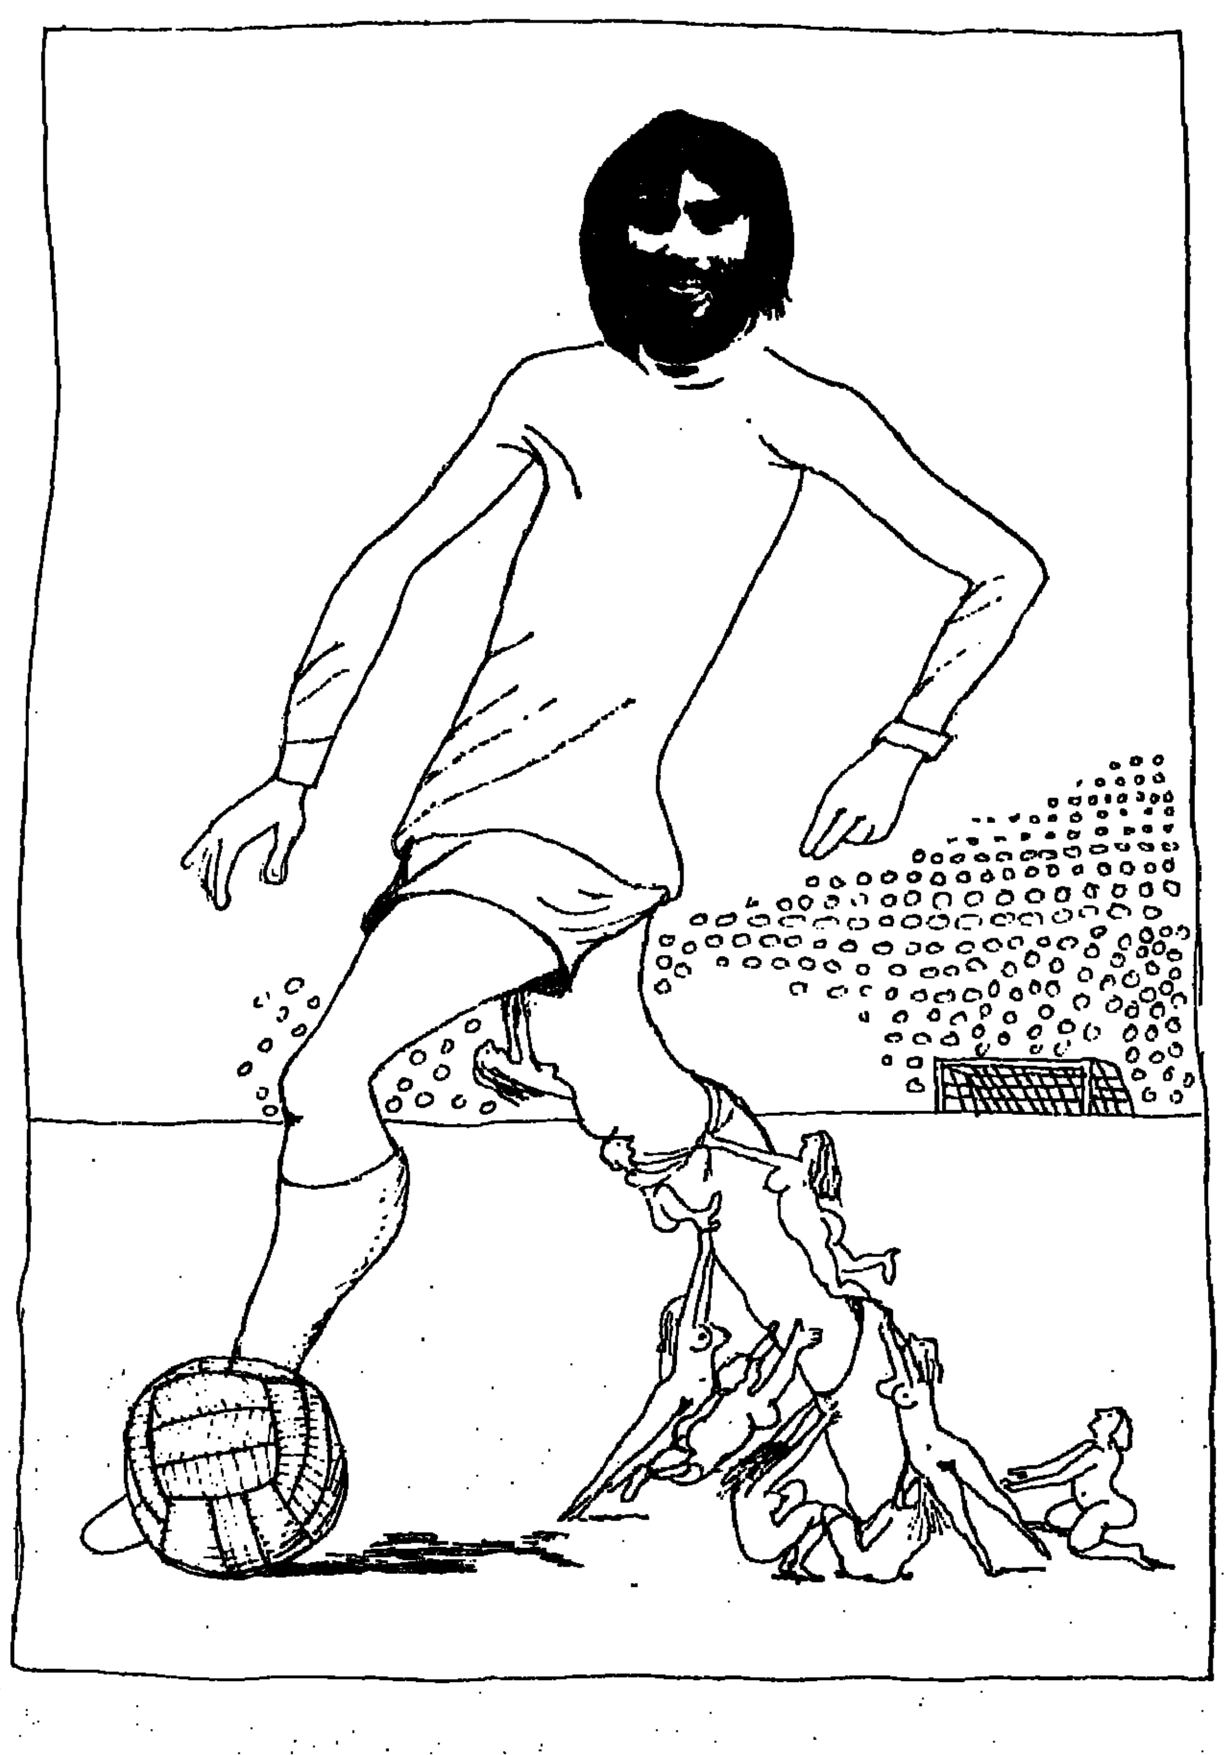
We played Scotland at Cel Park. I can't remember much the match except the score; we l 0—3. It didn't seem all that imp tant though. What had been m more valuable was the political perience, seeing the class system work close-up. For the first ti had been able to place football some kind of social perspective.

For the real winners of co are those who play it as a gam Me? I'm still trying to get a tea together, and keeping in trainin for the big match.

Next week: Michael Brearley wri on cricket in schools.

Truant in boots

Jonathan Croall considers what younger readers might make of the confessions of George Best



There's a new batch of children now entering infant schools to whom the words " George Best " mean almost nothing. They may just recall the name being hurled around playground or park by their elder brothers, but already they are more tuned in to the lightning strikes of Kevin Keegan or the imaginative tricks of Duncan McKenzie.

Up at junior level, most children who follow or play football stay up for, or else are woken up for, the Match of the Day programme on Saturday night. Until about 18 months ago, there was always the possibility that they would be treated to the sight of George Best at work, teasing and pulling apart, sometimes almost alone, some of the most highly organized defences in League football.

One night he appeared a little later in the evening than usual, after the slow motion embraces and pumping music had died away. He was in long trousers, a little tubbier than usual since he was in temporary retirement, and playing the verbal game with Michael Parkinson. That night he put himself over with a quiet sanity that caused many people to reassess their ideas about the reasons for his behaviour during his playing days.

Many children will have watched that encounter, if only because it required deft footwork to switch the set off before one show merged into another. Now the two men have again exchanged words in the format of a book*, it is reasonable to assume that when the paperback version arrives, a few hundred children, no longer satisfied by Shoot or Skinhead, may well look through a few of its pages. What will they find?

To start with, they'll have their work cut out if they're looking for something other than a rundown of Best's adventures in the bars and bedrooms of our provincial cities. The narrative of what the dust-jacket inevitably describes as "his life and loves" dwindles into a sorry, strangely furtive effort to tell what went on behind the bicycle sheds. Yet quite a few teenage boys have a much less contemptuous and mechanical view of girls than George Best, and will soon tire of his telling them that he never did.

Similarly, younger readers with any enthusiasm for the history of the game will find in the book little new information about, or original evaluation of the footballing events in which Best played the star part, whether as hero or villain. The fall from grace of Manchester United, the demise of the brilliant individual player, the new life-style of the men at the top—all these kinds of questions have been scrutinized in more detail and with greater sensitivity than Parkinson allows himself capable of.

Children browsing through the book will most likely fix on the sections marked " George's Story " which alternate with his interviewer's romp " through the cuttings ". Yet even these conversations reflect Parkinson's preoccupations as much as those of his subject. It is he who has decided on the themes, shaped the questions and, presumably, made the final selection from the transcripts.

The disappointing feature of these so-called revelations is that they actually reveal so little. For Parkinson, an " intimate biography " defines itself as gossip in print. He has always liked Best, both as a footballer and as a private person. Yet this liking puts him at a grave disadvantage. While it enables him to get in touch with his subject to a degree most biographers would envy, it also prevents him from conveying any of the flavour of their relationship which might indirectly have given us a clearer picture of Best's personality.

In 140 pages Parkinson gives less of Best the man and boy than Arthur Hopcraft in his book Football Man provides in nine. Here is a characteristic moment from Hopcraft's first meeting with Best, after he had been with Manchester United for only a season: " After about an hour of trying to coax some personal information out of him, and getting little but nods and smiles, I said: ' Well, you're not going to get big-headed, are you? ' It was expressed as a rueful kind of compliment. There was an instant blush from him and a flash of temper in his eyes, the first spurt of the pulse I had seen from him off the football field. He had clearly taken the observation as an unwelcome injunction from someone not qualified to give it."

Parkinson, of course, belongs to a world and a programme where entertainers of various kinds are invited to " chat ", but not to upset their host or the viewers by opening up any conflict of views at a level beyond the superficial. (When someone like Mohammed Ali breaks the rules, the format falls apart.) His admiration for Best is very much that of a media-tamed Yorkshireman who sees, through the bars, that Manchester, both city and club, never quite managed to cage their Belfast beast.

And thereby hangs what I think is the main tale of this book—the saga of George Best's relationship with individuals in authority. It is a theme which emerges only incoherently and sporadically from the conversations, and does so in spite of, rather than because of, the " biographer's " intention. Yet children will still pick it up, for in many cases it will mirror their own experiences in school. It is also an important element in the book—perhaps the only important one—because it accidentally provides a glimpse of the paternalistic nature of a game run by, in Danny Blanchflower's phrase, " the last of the millowners ".

Football as a career is, of course, still a favourite fantasy of children of all ages. The dream in this case is grotesquely unlike the reality, not just because of the monstrous casualty rate of those who get over the first hurdles, but also because of the distorted view of a player's life which is put over through fan magazines, football comics, annuals and the popular dailies. Most professional players get pushed around in more or less subtle ways, but few are prepared to speak up about it as Billy Bremner did, when he remarked that " to a certain extent, football is still like white slavery ".

George Best differed from most other players, not just because of his quite exceptional talent. He also recognized what he could do from an early age, went ahead and did it, and was exasperated by anyone who tried to supervise his activities on or off the field. This pattern runs throughout his career. When he first went to Old Trafford he walked out of a number of jobs set up for him by the club, who wanted him to train nights only. He argued that he was there to play football, and ultimately got his way. He frequently ignored agreed tactics in a match, preferring to go his own way rather than follow the method agreed before the game.

" People always ask me where I got my skill from, and they look disappointed when I say I don't know. But I don't. I'm lucky. I'm gifted. I've never had to think about the game or theorize about it. I hate being told what to do. I always did. Football's a simple game."

Simple game perhaps, but a complicated existence. What other highly-paid entertainer would be confined to digs in a Manchester suburb, have one manager (Frank O'Farrell) keeping a watchful eye on his hotel room door at four in the morning, and another (Matt Busby) go on at him over the years to do the decent thing and get married like everyone else? And then when he does tinker with the idea, to be told by Busby, " What's all this about you marrying a girl you've only known for a matter of weeks? And a foreign girl, too. Why can't you be like everyone else and marry someone nearer home? "

If players are to be treated like little boys, is it any wonder that the risk-takers, the players with the most exciting skills who refuse to subscribe to the work ethic—Stan Bowles, Alan Hudson, George Best—turn to truancy? (Kevin Beattie, who went home to mother rather than play for England, presumably suffers from football phobia.) It's sad that young George, who found himself at a grammar school which didn't play soccer, should take afternoons off to play the game, while older George would take afternoons off in order not to.

Maybe he should have moved schools—during both phases of his life. Now and then there was talk of a transfer to London. Whether or not such a move would have kept Best in the game, every London supporter had scripted his own version of the story. If, for instance, Best had moved to West Ham after United's European Cup win in 1968 (the moment when " I first started thinking seriously about United and myself "), he would have had a couple of years alongside Jimmy Greaves—and what could they not have achieved?

Had Best come down to the East End, he might well have been turning out for West Ham at Wembley tomorrow at the peak of his powers, combining magically with Trevor Brooking to outmanoeuvre generals Moore and Mullery. Football as a classroom topic seems to be catching on quite widely now, though no one has yet taken up Matt Busby's suggestion that it should be an O level subject. So when the children turn up on Monday, maybe a few social studies groups might consider why Best will not be a figure in the Wembley landscape. For such an inquiry, Parkinson's book provides at least some kind of primary source.

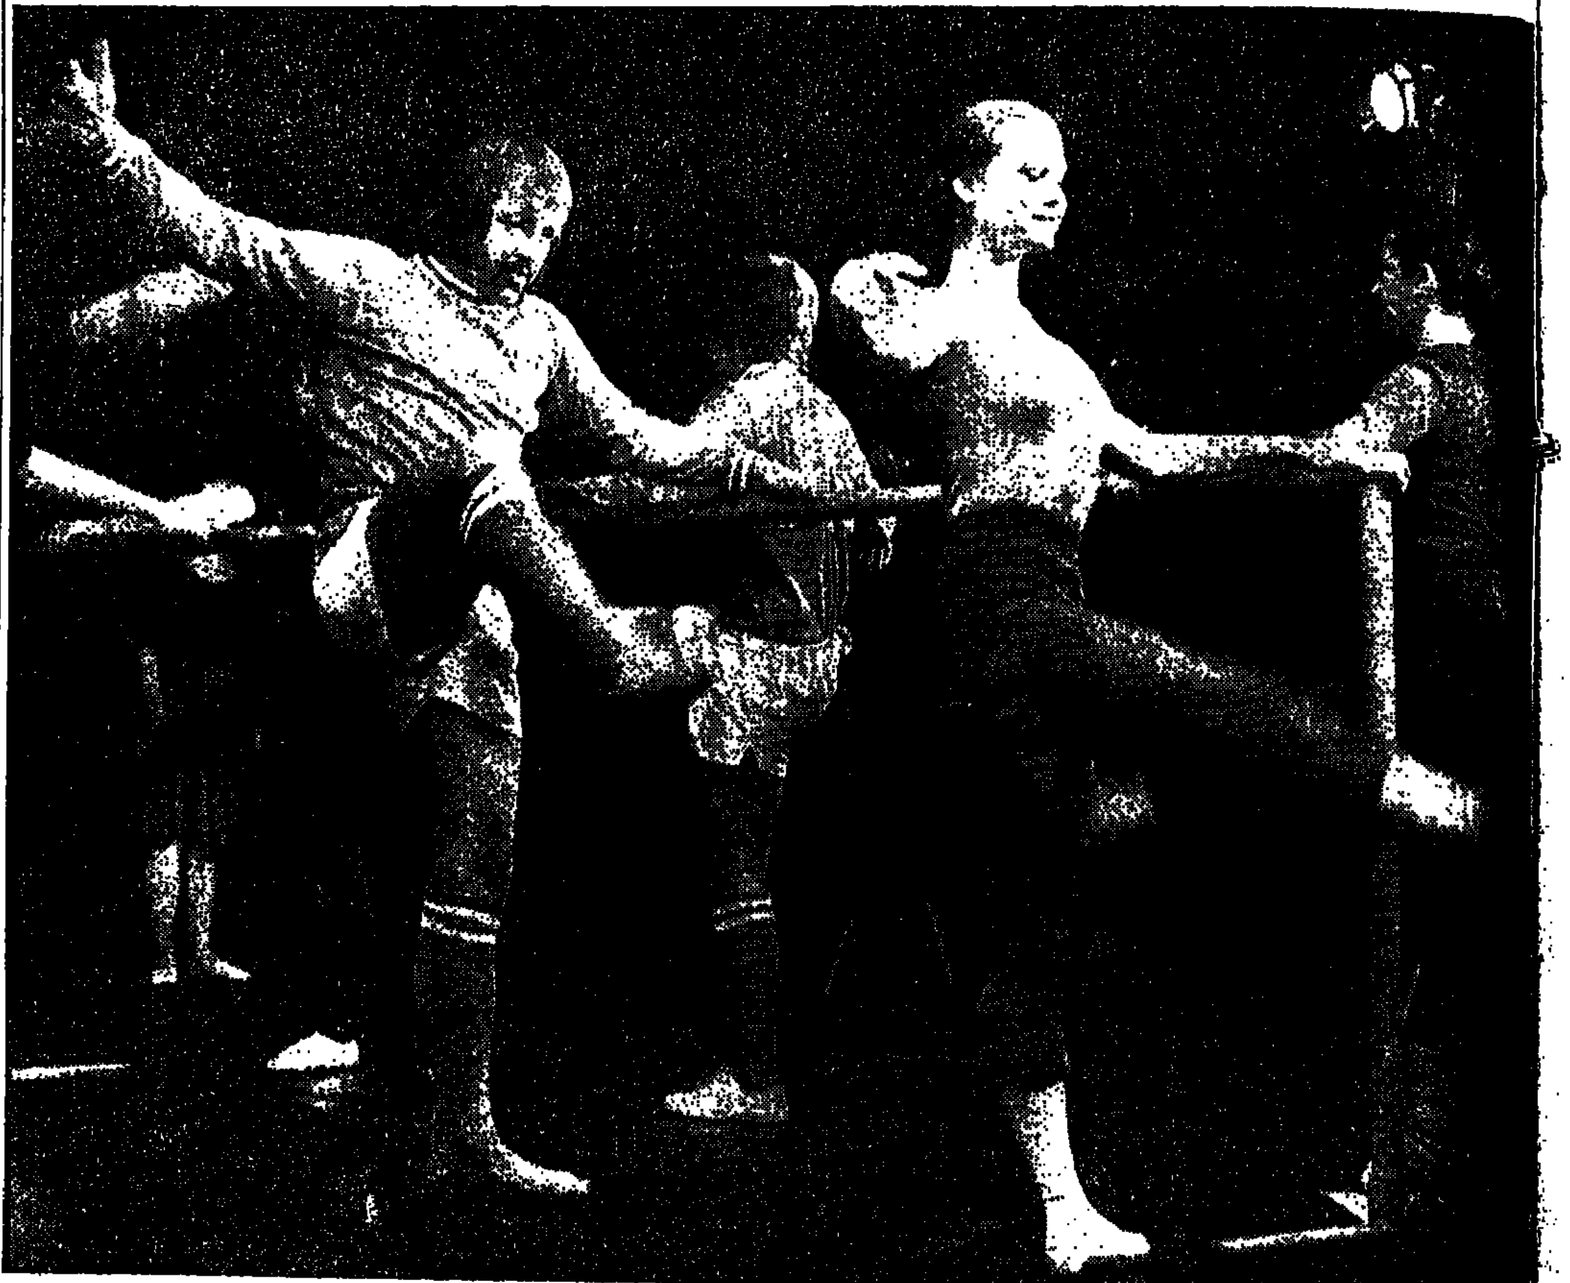
Bringing them to their sense

Colin MacInnes criticises
the low priority given to the arts in schools



Each to their own art form: Bristol City footballers train with the Northern Dance Theatre.

The Turner exhibition seemed a cause of national self-congratulation. Hundreds of thousands visited the Royal Academy, and Turner became the subject of telly fictionals and features, and of eager, if rather puzzled, articles in the press. The show, in fact, seemed something of a discovery: lo and behold, we too had a Great National Painter.

I am sorry to be sarcastic about this enthusiasm which, of itself, was admirable enough; yet what I found discouraging, and even ludicrous, about this awakening of our people to the existence of a national giant, was that it was so superficial, came so late and, in reality, impressed so few of the population. For the exhibition was very much a London phenomenon, and of interest only to the "educated" at that.

For the fact is that, were we a really educated people, everyone would at least know about Turner, and be to some extent aware of who he was, and what he did. For if it be allowed that Turner is our greatest, and perhaps only major painter of European stature, let us make comparison with two of our European neighbours. It will be found that no one in the Netherlands is ignorant of Rembrandt's existence, that most could probably identify several of his paintings, and that millions, in this much smaller country, would certainly have seen at least one of them (probably "The Night Watch"); while in Spain, few indeed would not have heard of Velásquez, or would not instantly recognize on seeing a reproduction of "The Surrender at Breda" that he was its creator.

What makes it no less than tragic that Turner's work is so little known to everyone, is that, like that of all geniuses, it is instantly accessible to all. For a Rembrandt, a Velásquez or a Turner, however esoteric their art may be in some of its aspects, present also to anyone with no specialized knowledge, a vision that is immediately striking and comprehensible. The sea and seascape, Turner's favourite theme, is surely cherished by us all; and about this working-class lad who made his own rules, and confronted the artistic and social establishments entirely on his own terms, there would be something immensely attractive, to anyone who knew about his life.

Why, then, have so few heard of Turner, or seen those lovely paintings, even in reproduction? Alas, because our educational system has consistently neglected the visual, aural and physical faculties of the boys and girls consigned to its unworthy care. All the emphasis has been on learning words and numbers—on acquiring knowledge through the intellect, to the almost total neglect of the senses.

Rising around us, we see buildings of incredible banality and crudity. Why do "the public" accept such monstrosities so tamely? Must it not be because even a well-educated boy or girl can leave school, and even university, almost totally ignorant of the art of architecture? It is not that our children have no natural taste—their own paintings prove that they have it in abundance—but as they approach adolescence nobody helps to form their adult discrimination about good building.

Architecture is, or should be, the queen of the visual arts; and England is a country which, until this century, produced amazingly original builders and garden architects. But what do most young men and women know of these, and of those working more happily overseas? And how, if they are ignorant of architecture which, in all cultures where painting and sculpture have also flourished, has been the setting for works of all the other visual arts, can we hope for them to regard painting, sculpture and design as something worthy of their interest and respect?

An ignorance of visual art is disastrous for another educational reason. Because visual artifacts (as buildings, sculpture, paintings) have come down to us in such numbers from the remotest past, and because, despite their varied cultural origins, they are more easily accessible to us than are writing and music created by alien and distant peoples, these visual works present an older, and more cosmopolitan, vision of the world than any others. By such artifacts, ancient worlds may be made to come alive more effectively than by any other means. Because visual art has always reflected more cross-cultural influences than music or writing, to study such artifacts is to free a child from cultural provincialism.

One of the Tate's more established cultural artifacts watches a boy creating his own.

As part of the icing on the educational cake—for that, unfortunately, is how "the arts" are regarded in schools—music is allowed a rather more prominent place, perhaps because it comes in handy for the school play or concert. Even so, it is regarded, like painting, as an extra, and not one of the subjects central to a child's education. Nor is it used effectively as a means for their general education. For how many, when told of the Elizabethan dramatists, hear also about (and hear the music of) Byrd, Tallis or Orlando Gibbons, let alone see the paintings of Nicholas Hilliard and Isaac Oliver?

The sight, on television, of professional soccer teams studying movement with ballet dancers, encourages me to hope that the physical arts, too, may one day be taught without shame in schools. What is the use of our people having created, in a generation between 1930 and 1950, a great school of dance out of almost nothing, if this achievement does not receive consistent educational support? And how is it that the descendents of a people, renowned throughout Europe for their folk and formal dancing, find teaching in neither at the core of their curriculum?

It is not only a matter of an essential element lacking in a total education, for the neglect of the visual, aural and physical arts atrophies the profoundest instincts of every normal child. Intellectual work, however necessary and admirable, tends, if it is not accompanied by sensual training, to inhibit children in the very part of their natures where they are, initially, the most creative, and the most open to learning.

Further, if it is felt that science students should know something of the humanities (as well as vice versa), then teaching of the sensual arts to science pupils seems even more appropriate than that of partial literary studies. For not only could some knowledge of them provide a neutral ground common to both disciplines, but more; some of these sensual arts are especially appropriate to the scientific mind, for instance music to mathematicians, or visual art to all science students requiring developed forms of observation.

One can, of course, visualize the contempt with which this proposal would be greeted by those satisfied with an intellectually orientated curriculum. The notion of examinations in sensibility is indeed appalling, the more so if the examiners have little of their own, yet at the root of this notion that word-studies can measure intelligence, while sight, sound and movement-studies cannot, lies a profoundly ignorant error. For intelligence can, indeed, itself through arts other tha intellectual; witness indeed er, not noted for the brillian his conversation, let alone th lity of that interminable poe composed between painting tures where his full intelli was deployed.

How is it that our nation, so of its culture, so fervent belief in education, has de that visual, aural and physical are only accessories to the purposes of learning? Per because of the lingering effe the negative aspects of the p spirit which, denying the while exalting the mind (prom it took in the appropriate ages), turned in fear and ha against the sensual arts which produced works as noble—and spiritual—as any the intellect created.

What likelihood is there that cational authority might be aware that, by ignoring, or— still, really—paying passing to, the importance of these arts in a complete education, committing a profound None whatever, I would though what I think may happ indeed, already in many has—is that the demand for kind of knowledge will come from the teachers, but their During my lifetime, the gr awareness of painting, sculp music and dancing and the re able achievements of our natio these arts, have come, with exceptions, not from the older should have known and taug them, but from the younger were determined to learn ab them for themselves, and prac them.

Polemics, Privilege and Paternalism

Geoffrey Brereton on Voltaire

"Will go far, but not necessarily in the right direction" might have been written by one of Voltaire's teachers at the Collège de Louis-le-Grand, the Jesuit-run Eton of its time which helped to educate Diderot a little later and, as the Collège de Clermont, had educated Molière in the past.

Voltaire's future course was not determined by his schoolboy acquaintance with Ninon de Lenclos, most highly respected and cultivated of professional courtesans, but then in her eighties and interested only in his mind, nor by his admission to the Société du Temple, that association of free-living intellectuals in reaction against the pious dullness of the ageing court of Louis XIV, nor even by the rude jolt he received at the age of thirty when a contemptuous nobleman, refusing to engage with him in a personal quarrel, sent his servants to beat him up instead.

Yet this last experience, and its immediate consequence, was more decisive than the other biographical factors on a man who by then enjoyed a high reputation as a dramatist, poet and society wit and discovered that all these qualifications could be huffed away in a few hours by the brute force of hereditary privilege. He had already been imprisoned in the Bastille for libellous poems against the Prince Regent. After a second brief incarceration, and confirmed now in his anti-authoritarian views, he was released on his promise to leave the country for a time. The two agreeable years spent in the England which had lately produced Locke and Newton and in personal contact with such men as Bolingbroke, Berkeley, Pope, Congreve and Swift, filled him with a half-assimilated love-jealousy of this island which he carried back over the Channel. For the remaining 50 years of an immensely active life he worked, part consciously, to transpose his rose-tinted vision of England, land of the free, to France, the country of the free-for-all, in which he was so ready and well-equipped to join.

As a successful financial speculator, the owner of estates run according to the best precepts of paternalism, an experienced puller of strings at court and in other high circles, a militant liberal in his campaigns for tolerance. a brilliantly aggressive polemicist, Voltaire would be an interesting figure if he had never written his major works. Better than Beaumarchais, whose career near the end of the century offers similarities, he typifies an age which has a character and fascination of its own.

It is often studied as a period of transition: politically, from dynastic absolutism to an attempt at democracy (leading quickly in France to a military dictatorship on the now familiar pattern); materially, from an agricultural to an industrial economy with galloping inflation throughout; ideologically as the Enlightenment, developing the progressive glimmerings of seventeenth-century free thought into a kind of radical intellectualism; and in literature, in Professor Mason's* oversimplified definition, as "an age caught between a dying classicism and a Romantic period waiting to be born". All these approaches are valid in part, but they obscure the claim of the eighteenth century to be considered as a period at least as strongly characterized and cohesive as the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and as worthy of attention in itself. If it was a bridge it was a long one. By standing in the middle one finds plenty to contemplate, with the added opportunity of running into Voltaire.

When the eighteenth century was labelled the Age of Reason (another only partially true simplification) Voltaire could be seen to personify an idea of rationalism easily represented as well-organized common sense brightly and pithily expressed but (or therefore) superficial. This alone would be no mean achievement for a writer—it could be applied to La Rochefoucauld—but in the field of ideas it would leave him far behind his more muddled but fertile near-contemporaries Diderot and Rousseau. As a philosopher in the real sense it would leave him nowhere and this must be accepted, in spite of his unpublished Traité de métaphysique. His image as a clear-thinking rationalist destructively hostile to the tenets of transcendental religion because of their appalling consequences for the actual human world is a true one, if again incomplete.

He believed for a long time that fanaticism could be combated by reason, not at first realizing that such a remedy is not on. One has come to see that fanaticism can only be opposed by another fanaticism, leaving the situation worse than before (an early example was the French Revolution), or must in some way be diverted into different channels. This difficult diversion seems to require the help of God, i.e. reliance on an apparently transcendental principle rooted in some deep psychological need. This Voltaire was incapable of exploring at that date, but in common with his century he placed it in general terms in human nature or the human heart, which led him beyond rationalism.

His tentative deism was a further step, hinted at in Candide's remark about Eldorado: "This probably is the country in which all goes well, for there must necessarily be some such place." According to the degree of irony read into this, one can attempt to assess Voltaire's own belief in an extra-terrestrial Utopia organized by philosophical Noble Savages, the only angels in his reformed cosmogony. It seems highly improbable that the irony is total.

That Voltaire remains blocked in his century is the assumption Haydn Mason sets out to question in his useful but inconclusive book. He notes the numerous "large and impressive volumes" which continue to pour forth on his author, and to which his bibliography and notes bear witness, but observes that "he remains for the undergraduate or the reading public at large an unknown writer". (What these two kinds of reader have or have not heard of seems an extremely hazy criterion.) He goes on to illustrate Voltaire's diversity by taking examples, on the whole well-chosen (though one would have welcomed more on Le Siècle de Louis XIV and on Voltaire's poetry which raises the central aesthetic question of le goût, touched on but inviting a fuller development), classes them under their different heads and gives them a descriptive and critical survey. This is the most valuable feature of the book, which ought to be consulted even by the most ignorant undergraduate for its comments on such writings as the Lettres philosophiques, the Essai sur les moeurs, the contes and the correspondence. These alone will give some sense of direction to a reader confronted by the millions of words poured out by this inexhaustible author who practised every genre except the full-length novel, yet was never stale.

Professor Mason begins unpersuasively with a handful of Voltaire's tragedies, which gives him the opportunity of pointing up the contrast with Shakespeare. But while Voltaire was both influenced and repelled by Shakespeare as he knew him in his eighteenth-century reincarnation (worth a separate study in itself) the idea of comparing him with an English dramatist of a completely different age and culture is more striking than illuminating. If Voltaire's plays are chosen to illustrate the literary climate of his century it would be more pertinent to examine his renovation of the legacy of Corneille and Racine and his cautious yet unmistakeable flirtations with the tragédie bourgeoise. In the same way a lengthy section on La Pucelle neglects to place this bawdily irreverent poem in the context of the French burlesque epic and to examine what became of it in Voltaire's more modern hands.

For the contes, Haydn Mason invokes Camus and Beckett and rightly acquits Voltaire of absurdism. His universe has some meaning, however obscure. But there remains the endlessly debatable Candide. In this and the Poème sur le désastre de Lisbonne it is difficult to read any hope for mankind. After all their reasoning, Candide's little group end as human vegetables cultivating vegetables, without even a Godot to wait for. Paradoxically, Voltaire's best-known work is an exception in his production as a whole, a fact which this book will demonstrate to an attentive reader.

PREVENTING OFFENCES?

Antony Flew on some new books on criminology

Progress in Penal Reform. Edited by Louis Blom-Cooper. Oxford University Press £4.50. 0 19 825325 7.

Quite apart from our general concern us citizens, all of us in what Dr Tom Lehrer so happily calls Edbiz have a particular professional interest in delinquency. Reading a criminology book can thus be a kind of busman's holiday. None of the present five offer a tour in the same class as that hosted by Norval Morris and Gordon Hawkins in The Honest Politician's Guide to Crime Control (Chicago University Press, 1969). But they all have their own less shining merits.

The American Prison Business is a traditionally American essay in exposure journalism. There certainly is plenty here crying out to be exposed, denounced, and—above all—changed. Thus Miss Mitford gives examples of research done on prisoners, varying from the pretentiously silly to the sheerly monstrous. The work of Dr Robert Hodges in the Iowa State Penitentiary contrived to be both at once: he produced ascorbic acid deficiency in his victims in order to describe the already perfectly well-known effects of scurvy. Again, Miss Mitford deploys examples of terrible things done in the name of progress and reformation. Old cruelties reappear under the new Skinnerian description of "negative reinforcers". A chapter entitled "The Indeterminate Sentence" brings out how this—like some other fashionable forms of flexibility—is at the receiving end felt to be, what it is, both arbitrary and oppressive.

What this book lacks is a theoretical framework; a clearly understood and clearly stated position on what, if anything, a penal system ought to be doing. Like so many other reformers in this field she concentrates on long-term prisoners, who are not being reformed, and on chronic recidivists, who are not being deterred. Through this concerned concentration upon the most lamentable human facts she fails to see that the penal system as a whole may, nevertheless, be doing something valuable and vital, by discouraging most of those outside from committing, or even seriously thinking of committing, criminal offences. A balanced judgment of any penal system has to make some large allowance for the disadvantages of the Hobbist state of nature, which would, presumably, follow hard upon the outright abolition of that system.

One of the merits of The Crime Industry is its emphasis on another of the ways in which our understanding may be distorted by concentrating upon prisoners. Being in confinement they are, of course, conveniently accessible to investigation. Yet, precisely because they have been caught and convicted, they must be to some significant but unknown extent not a fair sample of the class of all offenders. Mack and Kerner argue that an urgent effort is now needed to fill this gap in criminological knowledge. Obviously it will not be easy: "Successful criminals are by definition inaccessible."

The foreword says: "The Crime Industry is a discursive study of various aspects of European organized and professional crime . . . mostly in the United Kingdom, West Germany, The Netherlands, Denmark and Sicily." It was originally presented as a report to the Council of Europe. No doubt it generated a bit of agreeable travel for the authors, but even before their Dutch jaunt they ought to have known better than to write: "The country was badly affected by both world wars . . . but it was not directly involved".

Discursive this book certainly is, and much of the discourse is entertaining as well as informative. I especially enjoyed the account of the European butter tour: "While the butter was being transformed, whether in the course of nature or by a fiscal fiction, to butter-fat, the butter-fat to mayonnaise, the mayonnaise to fat for industrial use . . . a series of export or import subsidies was paid for each transformation until 10 million Deutchmarks compensation money was accumulated on this one consignment". Surely, the moral here, which the authors do not point, is that much of this sort of crime could be beneficially abolished by a liberalizing dash away from dirigisme and towards greater economic freedom; just as certain other sorts of fundamentally harmless crime have been in Britain beneficially abolished by the emancipating implementation of the Wolfenden Report.

Criminal Behaviour is a very different book. It is just what we should expect from Pitman. Packed with all the basic information and basic distinctions it has the greatest virtue of the pedestrian: its feet are always solidly on the ground. You could scarcely hope for a better introduction for those who want to start right by mastering the elements. Nevertheless, and properly, the author, who teaches in the School of Social Work at Leicester, writes under a fine reformer's motto from Beccaria: "Every act of authority of one man over another, for which there is not an absolute necessity, is tyrannical."

One comparison should provoke salutary reflections. In 1948 our jails held about 20,000 prisoners and in 1972 about 40,000. Now look at what in Edbiz we call the staff-student ratio: "Whereas in 1950 there were about 5,500 employed at a cost of £6m, the number employed today stands at some 15,000, at a cost of some £50m." Can this increase in the ratio be justified in terms of value for money?

How much more than simply keeping the prisoners from escaping ought to be expected from a staff-inmate ratio of three to eight? However, lest we fall into occupational self-righteousness, let us also press parallel questions about recent expansions within our own trade. Why is it, for instance, after a large increase even in real terms in the available teaching resources, that the best that anyone can say of reading standards is that it is impossible to show that there has been any actual decline?

Just How Just? deals, as the title suggests, not with prisons and the prison population but with Britain's criminal law and its administration. Lewis is a freelance journalist and Hughman is a solicitor. They work systematically through 11 topics such as "The Granting of Bail", "The Power of the Police", and "The Judge's Rules". Then, in a final twelfth chapter they present their general case for reform.

It is all much more systematic and thought-out than The American Prison Business, and always practical and reformist rather than revolutionary. "None of these changes would involve inordinate expense. . . . They require the revision not the removal of institutions which are part of our social fabric. For while research has raised doubts about the working of such institutions, it has never questioned their integrity. This quality is the most important. . . . It would be disastrous if it were eroded by a failure to institute reform where necessary."

One thing clearly demanding reform is the bizarre geography of legal aid: ". . . only 1 per cent of applications was refused in Car but 90 per cent were refused Bootle." Another odd index, sumably again pointing to s thing wrong, is the enormous sp of acquittal percentages reveal a 1966 study: 58 per cent of t per cent tried in Kent county Assizes and Quarter Sessions acquitted, but in Worcester only 13 per cent out of 107. university teacher is bound to der whether these very diff rates in different counties re stable through time—like the fa rates in certain universities university departments.

Progress in Penal Reform, b a collection of 20 previously published papers by 20 diffe contributors, is both in quality subject a very mixed bag. The tor, for instance, really ought to take it as just obvious to all people of goodwill that 'the pri purpose of "the sentencing pro and the treatments that follow "to encourage and assist the o ders to lead a useful and industr life". Of course this is an e mously desirable objective, but prime objective of the whole p system can only be to pre offences rather than to ref offenders. Noel McLachlan wr "Penal Reform and Penal Histor makes a good and usefully upper case for saying that "transporta . . . was probably more humane than the penitentiary system w eventually replaced it". Gor Hawkins, in "The Ideology of prisonment", reviews an Amer Quaker Report on Crime and ishment by a working party "w incidentally included Caleb Fo Professor of Law and Crimino at the University of Californ Berkeley and John Irwin, Asso Professor of Sociology at San F cisco State College, both of w have served terms of impr ment". Only an English w would think that this was participant observation a bit fu

INDIA: A REVOLUTION ON THE CARDS?

A. S. Abraham

Explosion in a Subcontinent. Edited by Robin Blackburn. Penguin 95p. 0 14 02 1822 X.

Most of the essays comprising this book were originally written for the New Left Review. In their present version, they have been revised to bring them up to date. Even so, events have moved on in the Indian subcontinent so that they are already somewhat dated.

In India, the rise of the popular "JP movement" led by Mr Jayaprakash Narayan, the ex-communist Gandhian, is posing the most serious threat to Mrs Gandhi's government that it has yet faced. With the exception of the pro-Moscow Communist Party of India, which supports the Congress regime, all the other opposition parties, including the Communist Party of India (Marxist), have thrown their weight in varying degrees behind it.

In Pakistan, Mr Bhutto's grip on the country is tighter now than ever before, even as popular unrest in the turbulent provinces of Baluchistan and the North-West Frontier is swelling.

In Bangladesh, Sheikh Mujibur Rahman has proclaimed a one-party state, assumed sweeping powers and embarked on what seems to be an ujamaa-type cooperative system of agriculture.

And in Sri Lanka, the fourth country the book deals with, the confrontation between the Hindu minority Tamils and the Buddhist majority Sinhalese is daily intensifying.

But although the political set-up on which these essays are based has altered in many ways since they were written, this does no more than marginally affect the authors' analyses, interpretations and conclusions.

As the rather melodramatic title of this collection indicates, their point of view is that the abortive communist insurrection in Sri Lanka in April 1971, the break-up of Pakistan and the emergence of Bangladesh in the same year and the various rumblings for some years now of militant discontent in India, particularly in West Bengal, together manifest the inherent contradictions in which the bourgeois-capitalist-imperialist governments running these countries find themselves enmeshed. As Robin Blackburn says in alarmist fashion: ". . . time is running out for the possessing classes of the subcontinent".

I would be wrong, however, to give the impression that this is a book full of rabid leftist declamation, although sometimes it does read like that, especially Tariq Ali's contribution, "Pakistan and Bangladesh: Results and Prospects". For the most part, the essays are expert, penetrating exposés of the social economic and political forces at work in the subcontinent.

Meghnad Desai's "India: Emerging Contradictions of Slow Capitalist Development," and Prabhat Patnaik's "Imperialism and the Growth of Indian Capitalism" are outstanding pieces of economic dissection and fine, clear writing. (A note on the contributors to the book would have been useful, by the way.)

Both "Politics and Society in Bengal", by Premen Addy and Ibne Azad, and "The Ceylonese Insurrection", by Fred Halliday, brilliantly combine historical narrative with political analysis. The inclusion of the remarkable speech to the Ceylon Criminal Justice Commission by one of the leaders of the 1971 insurrection, Rohan Wijeweera, is a distinct asset to the collection.

One does not have to share the ideology of those writers to endorse most of what they say. For example, they rightly contend that the very "success", in quantitative terms, of some development initiatives such as the Green Revolution, chiefly in wheat, in some parts of India is sharpening the contradiction between, on the one hand, the Congress government's commitment to big farmers (on whom it relies for rural votes and election funds) and, on the other, its anxiety to placate the urban classes by giving them enough food at reasonable prices.

Since the farmers demand an ever-higher grain procurement price and urban-dwellers resent rising foodgrain prices, the government is in an impossible situation. Even if it subsidizes the cost of foodgrains in the cities and towns, the subsidies will have to come from fresh levies on urban taxpayers! And it steadfastly refuses to tax directly the vast rural incomes which the big landlords are earning.

The growing pauperization of the bulk of the peasantry throughout the subcontinent is equally the result of the "success" of big landlords who are buying out smallholders (the majority among cultivators) and turning them into wage-labourers earning in some cases, as a recent survey in some half-dozen districts in the Burdwan area of West Bengal showed, 75 pence a month. Between 1961 and 1971 the proportion of rural labour to the country's total workforce went up from 17 to 27 per cent, while that of cultivators came down from 53 to 43 per cent.

The Indian sub-continent, undoubtedly, is characterized today by mass poverty, elitist government and economic exploitation. But whether this mixture is as immediately combustible as the book's contents, title and cover (a globe with a lighted fuse) make out is another matter. The authors themselves lament the impotence and fragmentation of the various leftist parties and movements. Equally, they condemn the communist powers, particularly China, for supporting bourgeois governments against proletarian opposition. They should also be able to see that movements seeking to bring about major social upheavals in the sub-continent have little chance of success without the backing and the willingness to intervene militarily of a major world or regional power; both the failure of the Ceylon insurrection and the success of the Bangladesh independence struggle prove this.

So why necessarily should a revolution occur, let alone succeed? That will depend on how the contending forces play their cards and even the most wildly optimistic communist will have to concede that in the Indian sub-continent the leftists are playing such cards as they have astonishingly badly.

When one adds to this the neglect in the authors' assess of the sub-continental situation the specific cultural factors (if they are mentioned, it is to dismiss them), then the likeli of that long-awaited and repea postponed explosion over the place becomes even more remo

Why is such discontent as is in India today being directed a Gandhian, admittedly a w headed one? Why do leftist par tag along, rather than lead? do regionalism, religion, caste language play so major a throughout the subcontinent, lac ing among the leftist groups? (chairman of the pro-Moscow has written the foreword to a book by his son-in-law which that dialectical materialism was adumbrated in the ancient scriptures!) In April, 1971, the rectionists were not entirely fr such cultural influences, as neglect of the Tamil prol showed. All this may be "u cation", but in politics it is much whether what people is true or untrue that is impo as the fact that they believe it.

Can a society that has millennia been profoundly fluenced by a non-acquisitive, materialist world outlook, that seen the world solipsistically, has emphasized not objective subjective, personal change, th sought harmony with rather the exploitation of nature, th believed in the transcendence, the fulfilment of the ego, can a society be converted to dialect materialism so easily? Does failure of leftist movements to reflect perhaps a half-hearted mitment to an ultimately philosophy?

The possibility of an "explos in the Indian sub-continent, think, a much more complex than is suggested by the straig forward, albeit sharp, analysis the "objective" situation displa in this book.

TYRANNY OF FACTS

John Pratt

The Philosophy of Karl Popper. Edited by Paul A. Schilpp. Alcove Press for Open Court, two volumes. £15.00. 0 85657 021 4.

Sir Karl Popper can claim to be the most significant philosopher of the century. He is also the most tantalizing. His importance lies, unlike that of most philosophers, not in the esotericism of his work, but in his refusing to be led by unchallenged assumptions which enables him to offer solutions to many real philosophical problems. But he tantalizes because his work suggests—but never fully develops—original solutions to a much wider range of problems especially in social science and education.

His life's work is outlined in this contribution to the Library of Living Philosophers. It contains his autobiography, 33 descriptive and critical essays on his philosophy, his replies to these critics and a complete bibliography of his works. His importance is such that this is the first two-volume contribution to the series.

Popper's achievement is colossal. He has revolutionized science. He has made philosophy return to "real" problems rather than those of language or meaning. He has written a classic work on democratic politics. He has undermined sociology. He has fought for his approach in physics, biology, history and psychology, and he has pronounced views on music and education.

His autobiography records how he made his major statement in epistemology from which all his work springs. As a youth in the 1920s he was concerned to identify why Marxism—despite its claims—was not scientific. He suggested—outrageously—that what characterizes scientific theories is that they can be tested and falsified. He held this view for a decade before realizing that it also explained the major problem of scientists — induction. Briefly, scientists claimed that what made science scientific, what demarcated it from non-science, was the method of induction in which universal laws were generalized from a series of observations. Hume had pointed out that there was no logical basis for this; if one thing is associated with another once, twice or a million times, there is no logical reason why it should happen again. Scientists and philosophers simply "assumed" induction, because they couldn't do without it. Popper disposed of this problem by showing that universal statements like scientific laws, whilst they cannot be induced from any number of singular statements (observations), can be refuted by one such statement. Science thus proceeds according to the schema:

"Scientific discussions start with a problem (P_1) to which we offer some sort of tentative solution — a tentative theory (TT); this theory is then criticized, in an attempt at error elimination (EE) [which] gives rise to new problems (P_2)." Knowledge, according to Popper, is conjectural; the growth of knowledge—discovery—proceeds by trial and error, by criticism; we learn by our mistakes, and there is no final demonstrable knowledge.

Popper followed this work with the publication of The Poverty of Historicism and The Open Society and its Enemies in which he used rational and critical argument to mount a ferocious attack on totalitarianism. He argued for an open society where knowledge is advanced and social and political progress attained by critical analysis. In so doing he pointed out the vacuity of most social science and social planning, which are respectively inductive and utopian and unmonitored. He argued for the scientific study of social institutions, and for piecemeal social engineering, in both of which the task is to formulate problems, and to propose and test solutions.

Popper's concern with learning also covers individuals and their education. He says "most (or perhaps all) learning processes consist in theory-formation . . .". Learning is essentially discovery in which conjecture is tested by error elimination. He "dreamt one day of founding a school in which young people could learn without boredom, and would be stimulated to pose problems and discuss them. . . ." How many schools can claim today to be rid of the tyranny of facts and subject disciplines?

The challenge Popper sets us is to develop his ideas. The most tantalizing thing about this book is the small part that social science and education are accorded. Sadly, for Popper "the social sciences never had . . . the same attractions as the theoretical natural sciences". Yet this is the man who recognized that science is about the solution of problems, and who fought for realism in philosophy. There can be few more real and pressing problems than social problems and no science or technology less equipped to deal with them. Running a centre for the Popperian study of social institutions, one is only too aware of these needs and the resistance of academic and government establishments to criticism and change.

The challenge for teachers as for social scientists remains—to clear away the discredited assumptions on which they are based. There is no fixed body of knowledge to be injected into the minds of the young, only problems to be formulated and solutions to be tested. We need to test and evaluate our own activities. What problem is education a solution to? and is it effective? But in education, as in social science and physical science, we must proceed in the most modest ways; at least, following Popper, we can proceed.

LIBERAL NAIVETÉ

Stuart Hood

Television and the February 1974 General Election. By Trevor Pateman. British Film Institute Television Monograph Three. 55p.

The two previous BFI monographs have dealt with television structures and with light entertainment; the third ventures into the most sensitive area of political broadcasting. Unfortunately it does so from a point of view that does not throw much light on the topic.

Trevor Pateman disarmingly states that his essay is "not authoritative", being "very much a personal report based on the personal experience of extensive television viewing" during the February election of 1974, on intensive reviewing of certain programmes and the collation of a certain amount of published and unpublished background material. This impressionistic approach is unsatisfactory when applied to a situation in which precise political forces are engaged which might have been described, for instance, by the process of interviewing the politicians involved. Instead, the reader is presented with an assortment of documents, including, for reasons nowhere made clear, an entire article from Index on "The BBC and the Politicians". If it, together with the correspondence between the BBC and Plaid Cymru and the Communist Part are removed, along with Sir Michael Swann's address to the Royal Society of Edinburgh after the election, the reader is left with a very slim monograph of 28 pages.

In the course of a somewhat confused argument, Trevor Pateman comes up with a number of unexceptional conclusions, such as that the credibility of television's handling of elections "is built up in the closest positive association with the existing political institutions, the State and the parties", or that the failure to provide any serious discussion during the election broadcasts, independent of the politicians, of the state of Britain was due not to the inadequacies of programme producers but to "the structural position of the television organisations, enjoying much less independence of the political parties and the Government than is commonly supposed".

What is curious is his apparent surprise that this should be the case. Had he started from this premise rather than from a position of liberal naiveté he might have been able to demonstrate the effects of the role of centralized broadcasting institutions in society from his observation of programme details, production techniques, interviewing procedures.

This monograph raises the question of the precise readership for whom the series is intended. In the foreword there is the statement that it aims "to meet the need of teachers at all levels for materials and guidance for coherent work in television studies". If by "teachers" are meant tutors in higher education — on communications studies courses in polytechnics or universities, for instance—then the kind of argument pursued in this monograph and the kind of detail adduced to support it are probably relevant; below that level there is, I believe, a need for a more basic discussion of precisely such topics as the relationship of the broadcasting institutions to the consensus and the Parties. In that case the documents appended would need to contain such basic material as the relevant sections of the Television Act or of the BBC Licence and Agreement.

What teachers at many levels require is a clear account of the constitutional position of BBC and IBA of the procedures behind the share-out of time between the Parties at an election, and some description of how the control mechanisms work. But the latter, unfortunately, cannot be derived from looking at the screen. Trevor Pateman admits that his position was "similar to that of the great majority of viewers"; it is not a position from which they can be greatly enlightened.

EYEWITNESSES OF TRAGEDY

Northern Ireland: Crisis and Conflict. By John Magee. Routledge and Kegan Paul £3.50. 07100 7946 X. Paperback. £1.75. 07100 7948 8.

In few areas of current tragedy are present emotions so entangled with past confusions as in Ulster. This troubled land fits neatly into the format of the World Studies series, and John Magee offers an efficient guide to the problem. His introduction and commentary combine the understanding of a native with the detachment of a scholar.

The book's core is its 50 "documents", which include eyewitness stories and assorted speeches as well as reports, acts and white papers. The brief excerpts included from modern historians seem pointless, offering no controversial views and adding little that is not covered by Mr Magee's own commentary. It is not always immediately clear, in fact, where quotation gives way to editorial matter, since there is no typographical or textual distinction.

Roughly half the book deals directly with the turbulence of the last six years, and the remainder sets the scene. The starting point is the Jacobean plantation; there is a hasty glance at penal law, Orangeism, economic growth, Home Rule and the Covenant, and then Mr Magee settled down to examine the political institutions of Northern Ireland through the eyes of their creators and their critics.

Inevitably, some facets of a complex situation are neglected. The gaelic emphasis of modern nationalism, the fostering of a distinctively "Ulster" culture in response to it, the economic achievements and problems of the province; these are scarcely touched on. The viewpoints of the documents are almost exclusively those of reasonable, middle-of-the-road men, and the extremists are thinly represented. Nor is there an official Dublin viewpoint; one of Jack Lynch's more thoughtful statements might well have been used to illustrate moderate nationalism at its most lucid. Again, as in any work that relies on the reports of commissions and tribunals set up to investigate abuses and injustices, there is a natural tendency to emphasize those very evils; just as our documented image of the Industrial Revolution is one of brutality and squalor, so our view of Ulster in the 1970s will be coloured by the evidence so conscientiously assembled by Cameron and Hunt and Scarman.

THE VALUE OF HINDSIGHT

Now available in a hefty paperback (and at the equally hefty price of £2.50) David Robinson's World Cinema: A Short History (Methuen 416 183301) performs the feat of compressing three-quarters of a century of cinematic history into 350-odd pages. Inevitably there are omissions and simplifications (I would quarrel, for instance, with his cavalier three pages on the Indian cinema) but the breadth of Mr Robinson's learning is complemented by the width of his coverage. Indispensable for reference.

D. J. Wenden's The Birth of the Movies (Macdonald, £3.50. 0 356 0572 2) takes the historical approach by looking at the silent film in the context of social and economic developments. He compares it with music hall and vaudeville (both Chaplin and Buster Keaton enjoyed careers in the theatre before making a success of the movies), the emergence of the star and early attempts at censorship, the business side as well as the aesthetics of the silent cinema.

Araminta Wordsworth

Trotsky's autobiography (L. Trotsky: My Life, Penguin £1.25. 0 14 021839 4) is an absorbing work, exciting, fascinating, and, with retrospective knowledge, harrowing. In many ways the most attractive of the leading actors involved in the Russian revolution, Trotsky proves how impossible it is, except perhaps in imagination, for even the most gifted person to go beyond the limits of prevailing conditions. Inevitable failure, the world being as it then was, makes more tragic the inspiring picture he conjures up of the capacities and qualities of men. Instructive also is his record of the gradual dominance of the worst as the sublimely hopeful beginnings proved illusory. A work to be read and pondered over.

IN CLASS AND COMMUNITY

Juliet Solomon

Teaching Techniques in Adult Education. Edited by M. D. Stephens and G. W. Roderick. David & Charles £3.95. 0 7153 5205 9
Adult Education, Community Development and the Working Class. Tom Lovett. Ward Lock £3.60. 0 7062 3142 X

Many people who find themselves working part-time as teachers in adult education do so less for some particular reason than because "somebody asked them" or they "thought it sounded a good idea". Although in theory they have to be in some way qualified (and many local authorities run their own in-service training courses), they do not necessarily find teaching easy. Particularly in craft subjects, a teacher may lack the conceptual knowledge and background reading on learning theory and teaching methods which the fully trained teacher has had the opportunity and the time to acquire. It is, however, also true that often the experienced teacher who is skilled in the teaching of children may feel the need to rethink his methods when facing a class of adults.

Teaching Techniques in Adult Education could prove useful to such people. It is a collection of articles designed to provide a general text to aid and stimulate anyone who is in any way concerned with vocational or non-vocational adult education. The chapters, all compiled by experts, either deal with specific methods such as "The Use of the Talk in Adult Classes", or concentrate on allied topics. Each chapter has a practical bias, even to the extent that the chapter, "Relationships within adult classes", which could easily be concerned only with superficial psychological ideas, does not simply deal with the types of relationship that might be appropriate. It also justifies the need for such types of relationship, and states a collection of qualities that the teacher can cultivate in order to develop them satisfactorily. This practical approach can also be seen clearly in the chapter called "Teaching Aids" which includes an appendix of useful addresses such as film libraries and information centres.

As well as being practical in terms of content, each chapter is carefully structured and subdivided by section headings. Thus the chapter "Student Activity Outside the Classroom" includes sections on individual work, group work, class projects, local studies, visits and exhibitions. This makes the book easy to use for reference purposes.

Despite the book's obvious usefulness in the standard adult teaching situation, the authors have not seriously considered the methods that might be appropriate to the community-oriented developments now taking place in adult education in some areas. In the last chapter, "A Rationale for Adult Education", ideas of personality development, community service and social responsibility are introduced. The explicit inclusion of such ideas within particular classes, or indeed even the use of such subjects as the study focus of a class or group, is nowhere developed.

It would almost be possible to treat Adult Education, Community Development and the Working Class as a complementary text. Tom Lovett, who is working-class by origin and was himself educated as an adult, describes in this book the development work undertaken jointly by the Workers' Educational Association and the Educational Priority Area Project among the working-class communities in central Liverpool. Education and community development are considered as closely related activities. The problem of what constitutes "education" and ought therefore to be handled by adult educationists, and on the other hand what should be left to the community workers, is central. For the Liverpool workers, who were in continuous and close contact with each other, adult education begins with the awakening of people's awareness to issues such as housing, drugs, and education itself. The idea of classroom, and what to do in it, thus becomes a side-issue; the problem with which Lovett is involved is how to get people to see the value of education. The kind of starting-point used to form basic groups in the Liverpool project varied from a pub, in which discussions were led by experts, to groups of mothers who met when bringing their children to playgroups.

The work described was part of a programme of action-research, and much of the value of this book lies in the way in which the progress of the various educational activities is linked together with the underlying theory. Since the three-year project and its components are described in roughly chronological order, and the success or failure of the various enterprises are analysed in the same order, the progress of the project is clear.

One of the aspects of adult education that appears to have received, for once, the amount of thought and sheer hard work that it deserves, is the problem of how to reach people not already involved in any kind of communal activity. The use of shops, exhibitions, local radio and house-to-house surveys was carefully thought out so that this publicity, which went far beyond the standard publicity methods of adult education, should stimulate interest and alienate nobody.

On the other hand, the part-time teacher in adult education could wonder what this book has to do with him or her, since it does not really explain where, if at all, this type of approach links up with the more traditional type of adult teaching, namely that of the evening institute. And while the final chapter considers "Future Developments", it differs from the rest of the book in not relating the ideas specifically to the Liverpool project. One is left wondering whether three years of action-research has continued; how it could have continued, and how far the ideas and spirit injected into the various parts of the community did, or could, lead to a self-sustaining momentum arising out of the community itself.

YOUNG READING

TRUE TO THEIR PERIOD

Valerie Alderson

The Other Way Round. By Judith Kerr. Collins £2.95. 0 00 184604 3.
Going Back. By Penelope Lively. Heinemann £2.10. 434 94896 9.

A great many books about the Second World War have been published in the 30 years since it ended. Most of them, like Ian Serraillier's The Silver Sword (Cape 1956) or Jill Paton Walsh's Fireweed (Macmillan 1969), rely on the more dramatic events for their effect. In the past two or three years, however, there has been a marked increase in the number of stories more concerned with everyday lives: Philip Turner's Dunkirk Summer (OUP 1973), Noel Streatfeild's When the Siren Wailed (Collins 1974) for example. But these books show a tendency to exaggerate minor heroics and give a romantic gloss to incidents which have more to do with Mrs Miniver than reality. Rarely does one come across a book with the integrity of Judith Kerr's The Other Way Round.

This continues the story of When Hitler Stole Pink Rabbit (Collins 1971), which was based on the author's own family's experiences as political refugees during the thirties, through the war years in London. Her account of life during those years has a quiet authority which compels belief: air-raids, restrictions, shortages are all part of everyday life, unpleasant, sometimes frightening, but accepted. Judith Kerr's Anna and her family were in a particularly vulnerable position as German refugees in a country at war with Germany and this could sometimes lead to misunderstandings and discrimination, but there is never any bitterness or recrimination. The close-knit, mildly eccentric and often desperately poor refugee community is portrayed with sympathy and humour.

Through these years, Anna is passing through adolescence and, here, Mrs Kerr has remained lutely true to her period. still has that unique mixtur innocence and maturity typic the 1940's teenager, which se to have disappeared compl from today's portrayals of adolescents, preoccupied with logy and sex.

HANDBOOK

The Teacher's Handbook for Environmental Studies, by G. A. Perry, E. Jones and A. Hammersley published by Blandford is now in its third edition at £2.40. Details and addresses have been brought up to date (although not to the extent of putting Ambleside in Cumbria, for instance) and the measurements have been metricated throughout. Unfortunately events have overtaken the revisers for they retain the key to what is now a semi-obsolete series of "One-Inch Ordnance Survey Maps". This is still a convenient handbook, however, with many useful snippets, sources and references. For a fourth edition perhaps the publishers could double the size and price of the book and at the same time make it truly comprehensive.

EGREGIOUS WORM

Grandpapa's Folly and the Woodworm-Bookworm. By Ursula Moray Williams. Chatto and Windus £1.80. 0 7011 5039 4.

Outwardly, this is a very attractive picture-book, illustrated by Faith Jaques, whose period characters might have slipped off the stage of a Pollock's theatre. Delicious anticipation is replaced by a distinct uneasiness on turning from the pictures to the text.

Grandpapa's folly is a country mansion of grandiose proportions which he has built for fun and its pièce de resistance is the Library. But, as Henrietta, Charles, Peregrine and Lucinda discover, it is a sham—the books are only artificial spines. The deceit is also unmasked by a creature of uncertain entomology, the woodworm-bookworm, who undertakes an eventful pilgrimage to the library and bursts into tears on finding the wooden replicas—though why, when he is a wood-and-paper amphibian, is not explained.

It is an unsatisfactory little story, inconsistent within its own terms; the egregious worm is the only fantasy element, but fantasy succeeds only where it creates and then sustains its own logic. Think of the Psammead in Nesbit's Five Children and It and you will scorn the woodworm-bookworm. The four children are not individually conceived, but come as a boxed set of Edwardian moppets.

The writing glances sideways at the grown-ups who might read it aloud: "You would almost think Beethoven or dear Mr Handel were playing." It will do very well, because it is pretty and plays on our national nostalgia for a world of nurseries and nannies that most of us have never known, but it would have been nicer, and funnier too, without the coyness.

ERRATIC HICCUPS

Francesca Greenoak

At the Bottom of the Deep Blue Sea. By Robert J. Hoare. 434 94151 4. Disaster. By Geoffrey Hoyle. 434 94155 7. What a Noise. By Robina Beckles Willson. 434 94253 0. Monster Men and Beasts. By Robin and Jocelyn Wild. 434 94154 9. Heinemann Green Grass Books £1.25 each.

Do you remember going into a classroom and finding on the blackboard a maelstrom of the drawings and notes from the previous lesson, all more or less incomprehensible without a context or explanation? These four books from Heinemann give me a similar sense of confusion. They hiccup erratically around their subjects, without ever coming to grips with them, and such information as they offer, is trivialized by the way in which it is presented.

These books all subscribe to a kind of representation of the world, which posits that materials have to be specially doctored for child consumption. This means that the authors have to operate a double standard; their concern being less with presenting an honest view of their subject, in a manner accessible to children, than with making arbitrary judgments about what is suitable for them. So, in the Disaster book, children are credited with enough intelligence to cope with a fairly complex technical explanation of the electrical causes of lightning, but are not judged competent to deal with the implications of disasters for people. All the information in this book is presented in a kind of vacuum, without relation to a world in which people actually live, to such an extent, in fact, that the picture illustrating the destructive power of tornadoes, shows a train being sucked off the rails with a flippant caption from one of the carriages saying "I suppose this means we'll be late again". Obviously one does not want to over emphasize the terror, deprivation and loss of life which ensues from natural disasters, but surely something of the human aspect should be included?

These books vary considerably in the complexity of the information given. While Disaster manages to give quite a good idea of the origins of natural disaster, What a Noise has a very stilted text, and employs a language so diluted as to convey virtually nothing, as in sentences like: "You can call, which is rather like singing, and that is another thing your voice can do."

A similar generalized deadness of vocabulary pervades Monster Men and Beasts. The author takes all the life out of the stories of "Grendel", and "Odysseus and the Cyclops" by giving them only a paragraph of summary.

This series has illustrations on every page (in black and white plus green), but unimaginative design makes for an untidy cluttered effect, and there are occasions where the pictures and text fail to link up. A sound-wave motif comes into a number of the pictures in What a Noise, but nowhere in the book are sound-waves even mentioned. Of the four, this is by far the most poorly illustrated; the pictures are fatuous, carelessly executed and at times actually misleading. The illustrator of At the Bottom of the Deep Blue Sea adds an extra element of interest with clearly labelled pictures of things only touched on in the text, but unfortunately, in this book as in the others, the general style of the illustrations is so desultory and babyish that children of middle to upper primary school age can hardly be expected to take them seriously.

I do not underestimate the problems involved in trying to create books for children which are both enjoyable and informative, but it seems to me that in overall plan and in specific detail, these books show only a minimal concern for the child who is to read them.

SHIVERS AND TEARS

Kipling's History. By Margh Laski. BBC Publications 85p. 12650 7.

Here is "the book of the cast", a five-part series pres on Radio 4 in May and August, and in June, 1974. Miss Laski tinues the process begun by T Eliot (is "bunking" the opposi "de-bunking"?), revealing greatness of Kipling to people had previously dismissed him each of the five parts, arching Roman Britain to after the World War, Miss Laski's percep commentary links a number Kipling's poems. These were rea the air in the appropriate voi gentry, Cockney, Orkney Engl Sussex, or whatever.

What the printed page lose sound it gains in visual appeal limp-covered book is handso illustrated from contempor illuminations, stone carving, portraits, engravings, photogr sensitively catching the mood of poems.

And what splendid poetry it is, so often bringing "a shiver the top of the spine and per a tear in the eye as well". (fashionable? But so, until rece were cloche hats and Victo textiles.)

What spirited craftsmansh what a variety of imaginative ide fication; what love and underst ing of England's landscape and her people.

The sourse of each poem and date, are given: the well-kno "Mandalay" first appeared in Ju 1890, in The Scots Observer; Storm Cone" in The Morning P in May, 1932. An index of first li makes reference easy.

Miss Laski says "I enjoy making these programmes mo than any other radio work I've ev done". Now readers, as well as the original listeners, can share the enjoyment permanently for a mode outlay.

Contradictory considerations

NICCI CROWTHER reviews new materials brought out to coincide with the run-up to the referendum on Europe

European Studies. 1. Tourism; 2. Houses and Cities; 3. Immigrants in Europe; 4. Workers, Unions and Bosses; 5. Language; 6. Food and the Cost of Living; 7. Women; 8. Farming and Fishing; 9. Europe—Yes or No? Longman Group Ltd Resources Unit, 35 Tanner Row, York. Price £12 for any 50 units.

With just over a month to go before the EEC referendum, the Longman Group has put out a new pamphlet, Europe—Yes or No? which deals with the controversies surrounding British membership of the Common Market. This pamphlet fits neatly into Longman's "European Studies" series, intended for sixth formers, and refers to information and opinions represented in other units of the series.

In general, the "European Studies" units present issues that are current throughout Europe: the price of food, employment, housing, women's rights, immigration and industry. The topics are mostly discussed through newspaper and magazine articles, which naturally vary according to the quality of the original material.

There is a rather woolly article on West German women's lack of emancipation. Far more directly informative are the tables on women's average earnings as a percentage of men's and the differing attitudes, both in law and at large, regarding abortion.

The units that deal most closely with the issues involved in the Common Market referendum, apart from Europe—Yes or No?, are Farming and Fishing, Food and the Cost of Living and Workers, Unions and Bosses. The present situation is rightly shown to be extremely complicated, but the general atmosphere is optimistic. Unofficial strikes are not a purely British phenomenon, we are comfortingly told: even West Germany has had its failings in that direction.

The similarity of problems affecting the different European countries is emphasised throughout: "The men and farms we describe are also representative of other varieties of farming which are common in many areas of the Community . . . ." says an article reprinted from The Times, " . . . although we have selected a young farmer from Anjou, we could equally well have chosen a representative from Yorkshire, the Po Valley, or from Schleswig-Holstein."

It would be easy to reach the conclusion from the information contained in these units that Britain shares a multitude of interests and experiences with the rest of Western Europe, and so should stay in the Common Market. But this is a conclusion that Europe—Yes or No? is careful to avoid. The pamphlet attempts to be unbiased and objective, though any reference to the other "European Studies" units will tend to prejudice the matter.

In dealing with the referendum issues, such as renegotiation, parliamentary sovereignty, the balance of trade and food prices, Europe—Yes or No? uses the format of the double page spread for most of its length, with arguments for the Market on one side, and opposing views on the other.

Almost all the cuttings used in this pamphlet are taken from pro or anti-Market propaganda, and so tend to be completely contradictory.

In this situation, anyone summing up the evidence may have to resort to calling one side or the other a liar. Particularly when the arguments are general and emotional, the whole controversy seems bewildering, if not petty. "We share the same European civilization—one of the great civilizations of the world", Jean Monnet is quoted as saying. But Enoch Powell thinks otherwise: "In the ultimate matter of life or death, survival or defeat, the insular position of the British nation has set us apart from the inhabitants of the adjacent continent."

Bloody Sunday variations

by Deborah Thom

Eyewitness: Whose Point of View? Sound/filmstrip set and teachers' notes. Educational Audiovisual, Butterley St., Leeds LS10 1AX. £6.25.

The publishers originally called this set Bloody Sunday—Whose Point of View? because the material on which it is based refers to the events and the subsequent assessment of January 30, 1972. The change of title is valid, however, in that the material is carefully designed to provide a discussion on the role of witnesses in the evaluation of any event. The set consists of an 83-frame filmstrip, a tape, half of which accompanies the strip, and a teacher's booklet.

The filmstrip shows the general and immediate background to Bloody Sunday. The side of the tape which accompanies the film is narrated in a pleasant female voice which does not obtrude. This first section is the weakest of the set: the pictorial evidence used is not particularly illuminating, and, more crucially, the past is not described with the accuracy that must be used to understand divisions in the Northern Irish community.

The advantages of the kit become clear in the next section, which takes the audience through the preparation for the march and the events of the day. The facts are those on which there is a consensus. Especially useful is the regular interpolation of diagrams of different tactics on the same basic street plan. This is reproduced on the back of the teacher's booklet, so that each student could have a copy to note debatable moves while viewing the film. The section ends with a list of questions which the evidence can pose—some matters of fact, some of opinion.

The material that follows is on tape only, and starts with quotations, from evidence or interviews, by journalists, soldiers, priests and relatives of those who died. These are not directly spoken, but reproduced, with varying degrees of success, by readers. Another group of quotations comes from a juxtaposition of the conclusions drawn, using the same transcripts of evidence, by Lord Widgery and Professor Dash, an American lawyer commissioned by the National Council for Civil Liberties. The aims of the kit are restated, advising close examination both of an individual's limitations as a witness and of one's own prejudices.

The tape finishes with what is, at best, an error of taste: a song which "illustrates the tragedy of Ulster". Apart from the fact that it is a bad song, with dull rhythm and banal lyrics—"a pawn lost to the game . . . his blood a crimson lake"—it undoes the good work that has gone before, by introducing emotional arguments that remain implicit and could colour all subsequent discussion.

The set is only valuable if it encourages, as the compilers hope, "a good healthy scepticism". They suggest similar topics which could be given the same treatment. Despite shortcomings in the technical quality, it has been approached with some sensitivity and has anticipated some of the difficulties likely to crop up in the study of such a topic. It would provide an excellent introduction to any subject in which witnesses have to be assessed rather than accepted—history, social studies, current events or politics.

There is great advantage in choosing a debate that is so current. Many students do not understand why people in the past felt that it mattered which view of a subject should be held. Forcing them to examine a question which is bound to make them partisan will help provide an interest in other matters of contention. Most students approaching exams or the end of a school career have begun to see that there is no such thing as a final judgment. They should find it encouraging to meet material which assumes that most questions are in doubt.

The compilers welcome and anticipate criticism of their selection which disarms some complaints that could have been made. Although their choice is fairly scrupulous in maintaining a balance, it presupposes two points of view—march organizers against soldiery, Widgery against Dash, although there were witnesses who did not share their limited common premises. It would have been interesting to hear from the young men who are referred to only as "hooligans", and who also have a point of view. Possibly they did not stay to be identified and thus revealed yet another difficulty for assessors. This kit could be valuable. For once the mixture of film and sound is used to some purpose.

Matters of conscience and consequence

by Anne Barnes

Longman. Schools Council General Studies Project. Politics I and II. Religion I and II. Subscription scheme. Longman Group Ltd., Resources, 9-11 The Shambles, York.

Two subjects, politics and religion, have been added to the list of thematic collections, published by Longmans for the Schools Council General Studies Project. Each one consists of 18 units, with magazine-style documents on various aspects of the themes. There is also a teaching unit which introduces the theme as a whole, suggesting various approaches and sometimes even presenting whole lesson plans. The material is varied, but on the whole most suitable for mature sixth forms. The standard of production is equal to the best that can be achieved in a well equipped school or college resources centre. This is deliberate policy, "designed to preserve the spontaneity of sources and to provide teachers with the quantity of material they need, at a price within the reach of departmental budgets". It is a pity, however, that it looks so dreary as a result.

The religious collection, edited by Michael Smale, deals with religious beliefs and practices and all their various trappings.

Sometimes, as in the study of sacred books, the presentation is conventionally academic, while other parts, such as the section on pilgrimages, processions and demonstrations, rely on startling juxtapositions and unexpected pictures. Some contributors adopt an apologetic, even facetious tone. The discussion of the role of the vicar, for instance, uses humorous postcards and advertising posters, with a bit of Chaucer and George Orwell thrown in.

The units vary in the quality of their information. "Matters of Conscience" takes in Islam, Colonel Gadafy, Jehovah's Witnesses, Mao Tse-tung, Tibet, and a terrifyingly beautiful picture of an actual hydrogen bomb explosion. The unit asking "Is there a God?" answers itself almost entirely by slabs of Bertrand Russell quotations.

Perhaps the most interesting unit is on "Men, Minds and Meditation", in which the author suggests that students do some meditation and sets out a routine for a group to follow. He also produces clear-headed and specific newspaper articles and comments on various types of meditation and on drugs.

Politics tries to describe politics in action, and prides itself on its up-to-the-minute, hot news quality. A whole unit is devoted to the February 1974 election, which must have been really fresh news when it was put together, but now seems uncomfortably old fashioned. Although the unit on Germany includes Brandt's successor, those on France and the United States have no mention of successors to Pompidou or Nixon. The European Parliament, which might have had an important part in this collection, is surrounded by such nervousness that only its background is discussed.

The emphasis is on practical politics—on the way that pressure groups work, how local government is organized, how a general election is set up, or on the political system of other countries. There are many diagrams and statistics which require quite dedicated study, but there are also more familiar and accessible topics, such as civil liberties and whether a Sikh motorcyclist should have to wear a crash helmet. There is great emphasis on student participation—students are asked to imagine that they are playing specific political roles.

The information given here is extensive and sound, but the production is rather cheerless, a bit like yesterday's newspaper. As with the collection on religion, it is clear that a lot of people have laboured and dragged weighty materials great distances, but somehow the end product is insubstantial.

Exciting New Language Arts Programmes

Language Centre 2

A comprehensive all-British Language Arts programme for use with children aged 7-9. Based on carefully graded exercises in Listening, Speaking, Reading and Writing. Pupil materials include Listenskill Cassettes, Reading Cards, Skill Cards and Pupil Log Books. Each child works at his own level and his own pace.

Storytellers

A new series of 90 minute cassette tapes recorded by some of Britain's best readers e.g. Jon Pertwee, June Whitfield, Julian Orchard, David Davies. The 30 tapes in the series include many children's classics and adventure stories, Paddington Bear, Treasure Island, The Colditz Story. Interest age 5 - 16 years.

Captioned Film Strips

Two sets of captioned filmstrips. One comprises 12 ten frame sequences each telling the story of an animal. The other one presents a plot situation which the children develop and complete.

Plays for Reading

An Oral Language programme for mixed ability groups through the medium of 22 specially written plays for reading aloud. Teacher's Guide gives details of difficulty level of each part. In this way appropriate casting is made easy. Accompanying exercises include such skill areas as Comprehension, Word Identification, Vocabulary Extension, Phrasing. Interest age 8 - 12 years.

Clerihews, spoonerisms and anagrams

by Anne Barnes

Passwords, Books 3 and 4. Oliver and Boyd, Croythorn House, 23 Ravelston Terrace, Edinburgh. Price 80p each.

So many books compete to help children to "use language" that the jostling for attention is getting a bit like the competition between soap powders. A moment's dreariness and they are lost. Their presentation must be clear, colourful, original and new because they aren't always going to get the teacher's traditional lead-in: "Open your books at page . . .". Often they will be thumped down on the table so that they can evoke a spontaneous "Hey, what's that ?", without any other introduction.

The two latest books in the Password series get just that response. Passwords 3 is suitable for the 10 to 11 age-group and Passwords 4 for slightly older children. Each consists of 20 short sections on different topics. Each unit involves different things—poems, pictures, stories, games, puzzles, scraps of unusual information, things to find out, particular words and expressions to think about. Nothing is too long. The stories are short, simple, and usually have an obvious point. Bits of poems are often used, or sometimes just a couple of lines on a particular theme.

There is a lot of humorous verse and the emphasis is on short rhymes or riddles which are funny and absurd. Among the clerihews and spoonerisms and Milliganimals, several more conventional bits of language lore slip in. Alliteration, anagrams, ballad, couplet, prefixes and antonyms become familiar and the reader is occasionally invited to practise them.

There is also a lot of quite serious vocabulary work in the form of a game. In Passwords 4 each unit flaunts one single obscure word, gaily coloured and flamboyantly printed. Each one is vaguely related to the subject of the unit but is interesting for its own sake—"serendipity", for instance, or "wanderlust", "colloquial" or "rapscallion"; not, perhaps, immediately useful to a 10-year-old, but quite exciting flags to wave.

Other exercises in using words are more practical. At one point the reader is given a list of adjectives and asked to choose the words "which you think best describe each member of your class".

Apart from this sort of exercise, there are word games, codes to break down, crosswords and calligrams to make and ciphers to sort out. Among all the puzzles and juggling with words there are short scraps of rather surprising information. This chiefly catches the reader's attention by its unexpectedness. "There are 4m for every person in the British Isles", we are suddenly told, or "The hair of a reindeer's coat is hollow; the air in it helps to keep it afloat when it swims". There is also more practical information, such as a conscientious account, complete with detailed diagrams, of how to construct a paper dart.

The pictures are varied and eye-catching. There are illustrations, with lots of interesting detail, and some rather tortuous collages to convey the complexity of such things as going to work or animal life in Australia. There are many well chosen reproductions and photographs of such unusual sights as three rows of small babies in high chairs dribbling baby food samples, a crocodile biting a giraffe's neck, and a close-up of a female glowworm on a stinging nettle.

Most of the topics are familiar enough. There are stories about coal miners and football players, descriptions of animals and the seasons, but no topic is overlaboured. The patchwork layout of each unit manages to make the whole idea of writing more lively. The tone of the instructions is matter-of-fact and workmanlike so that the assignments seem both dignified and important. Everything is clearly defined. Poetry is not left as a mysterious elusive power; it becomes a game which anyone can play.

One approach is clearly marked out: "Sometimes words just come into our heads without warning and without reason. . . . If we write them down we will find new words to go with them, words that rhyme with them or words that echo them, phrases and images suggested by the words will form in our minds, and we will capture them before they go."

Units on other subjects invite the reader to make a story-board showing the key parts of a film story, or the sound effects that might be used in a radio play.

The fact that each one is a lovely mixture of information and jokes and gimmicks with the focus of interest constantly changing is what makes the books fun.

Getting the Establishment off the record

by Ian Patterson

Poetry on Record. Yorkshire Arts Association, Glyde House, Glydegate, Bradford, Yorkshire BD5 0BQ. £2.16.

At the beginning of this century Ezra Pound was facing the central task of breaking the pentameter's hold over English poetry, opening it up so that once again the line could become the unit of sense, and syntax could operate as it had in the work of the Provençal troubadours, the medieval Italian lyricists and the Elizabethan songwriters.

It is on the basis of this work that subsequent developments have been possible. Attention and alertness, intelligence of the ear and the mind, recognition of the best that has been done and response to the world on the basis of it are necessary to meet the demands of our age.

One of the results has been the revival of poetry readings—not anthologies spoken by actors in theatres, nor recitals, but occasions on which poets give voice to their work. Such readings have become increasingly popular during the last 10 or 15 years, and it is now expected that poets should read their poems, despite the fact that in some cases this merely heightens one's awareness of their inadequacy.

In this context, recordings are a mixed blessing. Most people are aware of what one may call the poetry Establishment: it is to be found in published volumes, in the heavily subsidized poetry reviews, in radio and television and in school libraries, anthologies and examination texts. As an established culture this material dominates the selection committees of arts councils and arts associations, despite an almost complete absence of qualities which can be found in the work of lesser known poets, work which is of far greater seriousness and importance.

A record like this is typical. It has been produced "to celebrate the presence [in Yorkshire] of Martin Bell, Muriel Berry, Tony Curtis, Douglas Dunn and Philip Larkin, and to bring their work (and the special quality of the writer's own interpretation) to the attention of a wider audience". But why? Philip Larkin and Douglas Dunn are both widely read outside the county. In fact, neither of them is remotely cast as a regional or a Yorkshire writer.

Larkin, particularly, has exerted an entirely unwarranted and unhelpful influence on British poetry for 20 years. The other three are poets of doubtful talent. One is bound to suppose the selection either opportunistic or insensitive. It should certainly not be taken as an indication that there are no better poets in Yorkshire.

The five readers share equal space on the record, and the texts are printed on an accompanying sheet. The listener is thus encouraged to assess the specific contribution of the reading to an experience of the poems. Where on the page they fulfil the reader's cultural expectations, the experience of listening exposes them and one returns more critically to the written text.

Douglas Dunn's gritty sentimental assertions, which appear to have a lumpish "metaphysical" difficulty on the page, turn out to be merely perversely constructed. Larkin's plummy voice rises and falls, relentlessly varying its tone, pitch and emphasis in an attempt to stimulate narrative interest. The other poems have less to lose but share with their illustrious peers a kind of embarrassment at their own embattled rhetoric, without which the incidents behind the poems would (they feel) be indecently exposed to the public eye.

This record is a waste of money, but the idea is good. Arts associations should spend money on promoting poetry, they should produce records of poets reading. But so long as they support those who least deserve or require it, they are not supporting poetry, but contributing to its scandalous neglect in this country.

For poems to gain from being read, they must belong to an art based on a living language committed to using uncompromisingly the resources of language and living to make available adequate forms of contemporary knowledge. The poems on this record are bogus, pretentious and empty. They are fine representatives of the orthodox idea of "poetry", and it is about time they were forgotten.

Typewriting championship

The British Committee for the Development of Typewriting Education announces the British Typewriting Championships for 1975. They will take place on Saturday, May 17. Heats will be held at a number of centres throughout the country. The finals will take place on a Saturday early in November.

There are two classes, senior and junior, the junior class being for entrants under the age of 19. Within each class there are two sections, one each for manual and electric typewriters. Emphasis is placed on accuracy. Although contestants are required to type at high speeds, deductions are made for errors. The minimum qualifying speed for the junior class is 55 words a minute.

Each competitor takes two tests, a speed test lasting 20 minutes and an accuracy test of 10 minutes. Bricomitype Championships Secretary, C8 Recreation Centre, Monck Street, London SW1P 2BL.

On the medium wave

STEPHEN THOMAS looks at ways in which primary schools can become closer to the community

Even a small primary school can now reproduce cheaply a good quality school newspaper or letter. This has been made possible by recent developments in cheap and simple printing and copying techniques, such as offset litho and heat copying. Many primary schools use a newsletter to give news about school life to staff and pupils or a class magazine to keep other children informed about work going on. Because the average primary school is small enough for word of mouth communication, internal publications can seem artificial; a better aim is for the school newspaper to be used to build a bridge between the school and community.

A weekly newsletter, duplicated on one side of foolscap paper, is produced by the children of Sale Templemoor Infants' School, Cheshire, and sent to all parents. It aims to develop awareness of the school's work and teaching methods and provides a week by week account of work in each class. One issue, for example, reported the collection of objects for an African corner.

The idea of parents actually coming into the classroom to see what their children are doing is strongly opposed by many teachers. A newsletter of this kind achieves similar ends without disturbing the staffroom. It also provides a service for the neighbourhood containing, for example, a section on the activities of some of the children and their families, as well as making suggestions about interesting places to visit on family outings.

Without doubt the most far-reaching attempts to use school publications to improve home-school relations have been in the Liverpool educational priority area under the direction of Eric Midwinter between 1968 and 1971. A variety of publications were tried, from school prospectuses to simple newsletters. These tended to be teacher-centred and typically would contain articles on innovations such as i.t.a. Most popular with the local communities, however, were child-centred school or class magazines, made up of creative writing, illustrations and accounts of school activities and including articles contributed by parents.

Midwinter has written more fully about this work in his booklet, Social Environment and the Urban School, which also shows how publications can be coordinated with regular school coffee mornings, exhibitions of work and parental participation in class lessons, to build up a positive relationship between schools and parents.

Print, of course, is not the only medium available. Teachers at Elms Nursery School, in a socially deprived area of Nottingham in which parents' interest in school life has been low, borrowed closed-circuit television equipment from a local teachers' centre to make a programme about a typical day at the school. The 20-minute videotape was shown to parents at a cofee evening and generated a great deal of interest.

John Bennett, head of Crowlands Junior School in Romford, has taught his pupils to produce a number of 8mm films about the school and on foreign trips. The average primary school could not afford expensive video or ciné equipment which would be under-used anyway. But teachers' centres, colleges of education, polytechnics and university departments of education should be able to lend such equipment. Joint projects between teachers and college of education students could be organized. An increasing number of secondary schools also own video and film equipment, and could provide a valuable service for local primary schools.

If the use of films and videotape in the primary school is considered too ambitious, taped "radio" programmes can be an equally effective way of introducing children to a new medium. This is far less costly and needs nothing more than a simple cassette tape-recorder. A Liverpool EPA class and their parents made a 15-minute tape about a local street consisting of music, creative writing, reminiscences and the dramatization of street scenes.

Tapes could be exchanged with other schools. A Carlisle school intends to exchange videotapes with schools in the United States and Canada. Two schools in Newcastle and Bristol exchange tapes made by the pupils, developing greater awareness of life in another school and city. Illustrations will also be exchanged as well as letters between individual children.

There is a lot to be said about the role of taped or printed newspapers in furthering communications between school and the community and between schools, but what of the relationship of such work to the more conventional areas of the curriculum? The answer is that any kind of publication or programme will draw on the creative and written work of the children for its content.

For an integrated project based on local studies work in a Cumbrian school, children had gathered a great deal of information about their local area, its history, amenities and people. It was decided to present this in the form of a class newspaper which would be sold to other pupils, teachers and parents. In this way added purpose was given to a series of classroom tasks which otherwise might have been carried out in an isolated, undirected fashion. A variety of skills was required to complete the project: the children needed to examine their local community and marshal their knowledge in a presentable form; to develop skill in interviewing and talking to people as a method of gathering relevant information. Art work was also necessary to provide illustration and in arranging the layout of the paper. And, perhaps most important of all, an opportunity was given to the children to engage in different kinds of written work: creative writing, factual pieces, interviews, jokes, poems. If tape had been used the material would have had to be carefully scripted.

The arguments in favour of experimenting with publications and programmes of the kind described are numerous: improving communication at a number of levels, giving children the opportunity to express themselves in a variety of modes, developing a greater sense of purpose and direction in work of a more conventional kind. Perhaps the most powerful argument, however, and the one least heard in the primary school, is that children are given a more sophisticated awareness of the ways in which the mass media are produced. In this way they can be helped not only to become more critical consumers but also more creatively aware of the potential of new media.

Militants on the march for Mother Earth

PETER S. BERRY surveys existing resources for environmental studies

Environmental studies take two main forms, either as courses at O and A levels and in further and higher education, or as part of traditional subjects such as geography, biology and history. The Conservation Society's 1973 survey into environmental education in England and Wales showed that most of the 356 schools in the sample did some form of environmental work and that many others planned to do so in the near future.

Only a "hard-core", generally the more academically-oriented schools, had no such plans. In many schools environmental studies were considered suitable for the less academic pupil. The main difficulties advanced by schools thinking of establishing environmental work included timetabling, lack of suitable staff and teaching aids, the status of environmental subjects in relation to more traditional disciplines, and the demands of examinations.

Relatively few schools covered all aspects of environmental work recommended by the Conservation Society, and they seldom followed its other recommendation that such work should be undertaken by all pupils at some stage of their school career. Work on such topics as population, pollution and selected aspects of ecology was reasonably well established, but others, particularly social, political and economic issues, and the individual's responsibility for the environment, were frequently neglected.

Since the publication of the final report of the survey, there has been a substantial increase in requests for help from both teachers and pupils to the Conservation Society and Conservation Trust. The demand for the society's Guide to Resources in Environmental Education (first published on a limited scale in 1972) has resulted in a revised edition for 1975 published six months ahead of schedule.

The guide concentrates on such resources as broadcasts, articles and courses, and includes a selection of other recommended material. A great deal is packed into its 40-odd pages, but inevitably much has to be omitted. Fuller information is contained in Source Book for Environmental Studies (George Philip) which lists books, audio-visual aids, games, study kits and charts under 29 different headings, including noise pollution, leisure, population control and ecology. Resources for all levels of education are quoted, as is information on publishers, organizations, periodicals, examinations and university courses and a glossary of environmental terms.

Apart from the Conservation Society, who publish Conservation News and Good Earth and provide educational material and advice through the Conservation Trust, the Society for Environmental Education produce a regular journal and occasional papers on particular topics. The National Association for Environmental Education publish an annual journal with Heinemann; and the Town and Country Planning Association publishes BEE—Bulletin of Environmental Education. BEE includes regular articles on the Council for Urban Studies Centres. The Council for Environmental Education, set up after the three Countryside in 1970 conferences, now produce a monthly news-sheet and a quarterly Review of Environmental Education Developments, in addition to their well-known Directory of Environmental Literature and Teaching Aids and Directory of Centres for Outdoor Studies in England and Wales.

These organizations are mainly for teachers and lecturers, although they also receive many inquiries from pupils and students. Three organizations aimed specifically at the latter are the International Youth Federation for Environmental Studies and Conservation who publish Taraxacum, the Advisory Centre for Education's Watch, with its magazine Watchword, and the Schools Eco-Action Group, who produce a regular newsletter.

There are several other journals devoted to environmental matters, such as The Ecologist, Towards Survival (particularly concerned with political and economic aspects) and Naturopa (the new title of Nature in Focus, published free by the Nature Conservancy Council for the Council of Europe). Others are highly specialized, such as Environmental Pollution, Human Ecology, Pollution Monitor and Water Pollution Control, while useful articles often appear in The Geographical Magazine, Journal of Biological Education, Unesco Courier and New Scientist.

The number of books on environmental subjects and suitable for general reference or more advanced work are legion. Good general introductory works include Environmental Issues (Ely Resources and Technology Centre, 1974); Max Nicholson's Environmental Revolution (Hodder and Stoughton, 1970); P. R. and A. H. Ehrlich's Population, Resources, Environment (Freeman, 1972); J. McHale's World Facts and Trends (Collier-Macmillan, 1972); B. Ward and R. Dubos' Only One Earth (Penguin, 1972); and R. F. Dassman's Planet in Peril? (Penguin, 1972). One volume well worth adding to the library is Atlas of the Earth (George Philip/Mitchell Beazley, 1972), which, in addition to the usual atlas and gazetteer sections, also includes a good environmental encyclopedia section.

A growing number of textbooks for use in schools are also appearing. Valuable series include Location and Links (Blackwell); Man and World (Blackie); Discovering Your Environment and Science and Your Surroundings (Ginn); Exploring Your World and Today's World (Holmes McDougall); Biological Field Studies (Hulton Educational); On Location (Mills and Boon); The Changing World (Oxford University Press); Connexions and Extensions (Penguin); and Nature Library (Time-Life). The Schools Council Environmental Studies project has been published by Rupert Hart-Davis in four volumes, and its Project Environment is now being published by Longman.

Films suitable for schools may be obtained from many sources, including Concord Film Council Ltd, the Society for the Promotion of Nature Reserves, BBC Enterprises Film Library, as well as the Shell, BP and National Benzole film libraries. Among these, some of the most useful are Conservation and Balance in Nature (Concord), Environment in the Balance (Shell), Nature in Trust (SPNR), Shadow of Progress (BP) and People + Leisure = . . . (National Benzole).

Suitable filmstrips and/or slides are produced by Diana Wyllie (especially Population and Resources, Air Pollution, Water Pollution and Nature Conservation in the British Isles); Griffin and George (The Environment series); Visual Publications (including Earth without Man series), Educational Productions Ltd (including Nature Reserves in Miniature and Field Study series); The Slide Centre (Pollution series), McGraw-Hill and Encyclopedia Britannica. Aerofilms Ltd produce sets of 24 pictures (slides, prints or transparencies) on such topics as extraction, conservation and pollution.

Filmstrips with linked taped commentaries are available from Students Recording Ltd (including The Environment, Conservation, National Parks, Traffic, etc.), and W. Foulsham Ltd produce Seminar Cassettes (especially International Report and the Life on Earth series).

Wallcharts and posters on environmental themes are less easy to obtain. Pictorial Charts Educational Trust produce several suitable titles, and have recently produced a list of these under the title The Environment. J. Galt and Co Ltd, Tull Graphic Ltd and Frederick Warne and Co Ltd concentrate on natural history topics.

Useful charts can also be obtained from such organizations as the Keep Britain Tidy Group, the International Planned Parenthood Federation, the Central Office of Information, Shell, the Council for the Protection of Rural England, the Countryside Commission, the Food and Agricultural Organization, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and the Voluntary Committee on Overseas Aid and Development.

One of the most useful of the growing number of games and study kits is Man and His Environment and the more recent You and Your Environment both produced by Coca-Cola, 1974. The first is a study kit, with a magnetized board and various projects designed to teach basic ecological concepts; the second is a series of four filmstrips and cassettes dealing with many aspects of the local and national environment. These are designed for use together or independently of one another.

Blandford Press publish a comprehensive series of teaching materials, including slides and film-loops, entitled Approaches to Environmental Studies, all of which may be purchased separately. The North West Regional Curriculum Development Project have produced two social education kits on environmental themes (Conservation and Towards Tomorrow), which are distributed by Macmillan. Among the Beaver Units due to be published by George Philip are Urbanization, Water and Conservation and Pollution.

ESA produce Clean Water and Clean Air research packs in conjunction with the Advisory Centre for Education. Educational Productions Ltd have published Water in the UK and Air Pollution, and Architectural Press Ltd have issued 10 packs in their Lifescape series. Among the SACK series prepared by Community Service Volunteers are two role-playing games, Spring Green Motorway and New Steel Site—but where?, and there are some useful geography games produced by Longman.

There are several schools' television and radio programmes on environmental topics, including Nature, Our Changing World, History in Focus (BBC Radio) Exploring Science (BBC 1); Look Around and Let's Get Out (ITV). A series of 10 FE programmes on the environment is scheduled to begin this month (BBC 1).

Several courses for teachers are now being run or are planned. Details can be obtained from the Department of Education and Science and are also included in the Council for Environmental Education's monthly news-sheet. Teachers interested in more specialized degree and diploma courses in environmental subjects will find suitable courses in Source Book for Environmental Studies.

Supply service

A new advisory and supply service for schools, colleges and education authorities is announced with the formation of the Education Division of WCB Containers Ltd, the suppliers of plastic moulded products.

WCB will now be supplying the Kidstuff range of play items to suit children at all stages of mental and physical growth. The range, which was produced in association with a consultative design team, consists of a structural play system assembled from tubes and playthings made from tough polythene. Education Division, WCB Containers Ltd, Stamford Works, Bayley Street, Stalybridge, Cheshire SK15 1QQ.

Digital arithmetic tutor machine

Limrose Electronics have recently introduced a digital arithmetic tutor to complement their range of educational aids. The machine has been designed for teaching the principles of binary arithmetic and four-bit data word manipulation to senior students who have completed a basic course in combinational and sequential logic circuits.

Logic states are displayed on the anodized aluminium front panel by means of red light emitting diodes, and interconnections are made using Limrose's 1mm gold-plated terminal pin and patch lead system.

The equipment is accompanied by an illustrated instruction book containing numerous computer circuits which can be constructed on the equipment. These circuits include loading and shifting of registers, 1s and 2s complements, addition and subtraction of 4-bit numbers by serial and parallel methods and multiplication and division by the shift-and-add method. The instruction book also deals with the octal number system, binary fractional notation and overflow conditions in fixed point arithmetic.

Prices from £150.00. Further information from Limrose Electronics Ltd, 8-10 Kingsway, Altrincham, Cheshire WA14 1PJ.

Appointment of EDUCATIONAL VISITORS

It is proposed to appoint Educational Visitors for work with pre-school children from September 1975 or earlier if possible to join an existing team.

The main task of educational visitors is to foster the partnership between home and school in all its aspects and to help parents understand the aims of education. The work involves visiting pre-school children in their own homes to extend their experience through play, books, etc. in cooperation with their parents. In this way it is hoped that parents will gain an insight into how children learn and an understanding of a child's life at school. Contact with neighbourhood pre-school groups will be important. The persons appointed may ultimately be based in a nursery unit and will play an important part in assisting staff to appreciate the nature of the complementary learning of the child outside school.

Applicants should preferably be qualified nursery school teachers with good teaching experience. Applications will also be welcomed from teachers with relevant experience in other fields of education. Experience of voluntary community work or social work, whilst not essential, may be an advantage. Salary will be in accordance with the new Burnham Scale 2.

Closing date 16th May, 1975.

a/b = c
The Crucial equation of Recruitment Advertising

a = cost of advertising a teaching post
b = number of replies received
c = cost per reply.

On average, more teachers answer advertisements for secondary education appointments placed in The Times Educational Supplement than any other educational publication. So the average cost per response is lower too, because TES advertisement rates are very competitive.

It all goes to show what you probably know already . . . no other educational journal approaches the success of the TES in finding the right teacher for a vacant post at the lowest possible cost.

Winter sports

How recent trends affect the schools. By Mervyn Rees, Assistant Inspector, Kent Education Department

There have been considerable changes recently in the ski packages offered by tour operators to organizers of school and l.e.a. groups. These changes are largely the result of escalating costs, particularly transport surcharge, but also for accommodation, ski equipment and instruction. Despite this the number of British pupils going skiing has continued to increase steadily, and there are indications that the trend will continue.

This rise is largely a compliment to the tour operators, most of whom have made genuine attempts to contain prices within acceptable limits. However, it is essential for party leaders to appreciate trends caused by cost-pruning and prepare their parties for changes in standards.

Most tour operators now rationalize costs by cutting down on the number of resorts they offer. This is often accompanied by saturation booking, which makes sound economic sense. It is, however, important that organizers, when booking ski courses at these "British villages", appreciate the advantages and disadvantages they are likely to offer.

Many tour operators are also using hotels which are not standard tourist hotels. The past year or two has seen "school hotels" being offered as standard packages. Although this sometimes means a lowering of standards of comfort, I am convinced that this is where economies can be made, provided that heating and drying facilities are adequate and that the food is good and plentiful. However, tour operators should give a clear indication to party organizers when the accommodation offered is a "school hotel".

The combination of cost-pruning, crowded resorts and, to some extent, demand by party organizers has brought about a less acceptable tendency. Until recently, the normal period of ski school instruction was four hours a day. This has now been reduced in many resorts to two hours, with an option of two hours' further instruction at extra cost. This presents the party organizer with a triple choice: increase the basic cost to cover additional instruction; supplement the basic daily instruction by a further two hours of skiing, supervised by members of staff; or provide alternatives other than skiing for the remaining time. The first option might prove too expensive, the second is fraught with physical hazards if suitably capable and experienced staff are not available and the last could lead to boredom.

At some times of the year, there is so great a demand for ski school instruction, even with the bare two hours standard rate, that a shift system is introduced. The notion of basing ski school hours on the times of day when snow is at its best is less common. I have seen resorts where classes have assembled for ski school as early as 8.30 and 9 a m when nursery slopes are often icy. The astute ski party organizer will find out well in advance when his pupils are scheduled for instruction.

The current trend for some tour operators to employ British ski instructors at some resorts is a welcome move which, combined with the present usual maximum ratio of 15 pupils to an instructor, has led to more pupils enjoying their skiing.

The standard of ski equipment offered to school groups is, on the whole, good. Step-in bindings and clip boots are now common. This has led, however, to some difficulties for the hire shops when providing large quantities of equipment. This is because of the difficulty of correctly adjusting bindings. Party organizers should perhaps be capable of and prepared to do this for themselves.

Last year a small, but significant, number of pupils found that the £500 medical insurance was not large enough to meet the expenses incurred by serious accidents at resorts. With rising costs, it is now obvious that a figure of £1,000 a head is more realistic.

For the party organizer, the implications of these general trends are reasonably clear. It is more than ever necessary to take great care over selecting a ski package. Price and value for money vary widely and are not always immediately obvious from reading brochures. It can be helpful to contact colleagues who have visited resorts in which you are interested. I maintain a register of ski reports for schools in Kent, each submitted by party organizers after their ski course on a prepared form. The report gives an assessment of many aspects concerning standards of arrangements, instruction, equipment and accommodation. Reports, of which there are now nearly 100, are available in photocopies to any Kent school considering a ski course.

To obtain maximum value for money, party organizers need to prepare pupils physically for what is likely to be a demanding week on the slopes.

While in the past this has meant pre-ski exercises, the increase of artificial ski slopes in Britain means that thorough preparation is possible. They also provide an all-year round outlet for those who want more skiing as the result of a successful course. The extra cost of artificial slope lessons before setting foot on snow is money well spent. Pupils with five hours' sound experience on artificial slopes have the equivalent standard of second-year skiers. Artificial slopes should also play an active role in helping teachers to improve as coaches.

No review of trends in educational aspects of skiing can ignore cases of bad behaviour by British pupils abroad. It would be easy to quote sensational examples, but this would be unfair to most parties which are well led and constituted. A significant number of hotels have closed their doors permanently to British parties because of bad behaviour. Another thing which appears to be causing bad feeling is shoplifting. It is no compliment to our pupils and our leadership that in some ski resorts shopkeepers are putting up notices, significantly written in English only, warning that shoplifters will be prosecuted. The solution can only lie in the hands of responsible leadership at all levels.

Promoting interest

'Skiing now for all.' By Ian Graeme, Secretary, The National Ski Federation of Great Britain

The trustees of the King George Jubilee Trust gave a grant of £1,500 last year to promote interest in skiing among English schools and they renewed this grant for the current year. The National Ski Federation of Great Britain screened the results of 6,000 children from more than 400 schools taking British Alpine junior ski tests and gave grants to 30 schools, three schools in each of the 10 English regional ski associations. In most cases the regional ski associations distributed the awards at special events.

Coca-Cola have sponsored these tests for seven years. The results have been most successful. The total number of tests taken this year will exceed 11,000 of which some 3,000 will be done in Scotland, 1,500 by Welsh schools and 6,500 by English schools and children, most of which will be done abroad. We have already had results of tests taken this year in Norway, Bulgaria, Spain and Andorra, as well as the usual resorts in the Alps.

The advent of "hot dog" and "ballet" events have captured the imagination of the young who find them exciting, fun and satisfying especially on artificial slopes although the elderly purists frown on these antics as being "not proper skiing". How wrong they are. To be able to execute these exercises requires technical ability, courage confidence and agility, all of which are essential for good skiing. The events are competitive, but easy to arrange and spectacular. They provide competition both on snow in Scotland and on artificial slopes which will produce talent. Together with an increasing following of grass skiing and ski-orienteering, skiing is now a sport for all.

The Sunday Times book We Learned to Ski with its excellent diagrams and easily understood text together with the publicity arising from the TV series, featuring Gina Hathorn, has supported the first-class instruction now found on artificial ski slopes and these have all contributed to a noticeable rise in the general standard of British skiers.

The antipathy to short skis both for beginners and proficient skiers has vanished. Short skis cut down the risk of accidents, but still require properly adjusted release binding and well-fitting boots; they are easier to handle and enable a person to ski longer and faster

A Snow Guarantee from Hourmont

No one can forecast the weather or snow at any resort and, if snow conditions are poor, the cost of travelling to other slopes can cripple the finely balanced budget of any school.

Hourmont, the Bristol-based school travel specialists, recently announced the introduction of a Snow Guarantee which provides transport to alternative slopes at no extra charge for parties travelling before 22nd March next year. Schools travelling after that date will be charged only £2 per week if transport proves necessary.

Mr. Tony Hourmont, the company's Managing Director, claims their Snow Guarantee is one of the most significant advances in ski-ing for schools during the past decade. "It is another step in giving a really inclusive, high quality deal to schools. We were the pioneers of low-cost jet travel for schools and the first to guarantee modern clip-on boots and step-in bindings. We think our Snow Guarantee will be welcomed by every party Leader."

Largest in School Travel

Hourmont was founded nearly 20 years ago by schoolteacher Mr. Robert Hourmont and has steadily grown to become the largest school travel organisation in the United Kingdom.

The present Managing Director is a keen skier and emphasises that Hourmont are not merely a travel organisation but first and foremost a ski-ing organisation. "Our resorts, our hotels and our ski schools are chosen especially with the needs of the young skier in mind" says Mr. Hourmont. "Ski-ing is a fantastic sport, but the novice needs ideal conditions and first class tuition, especially in the first few days. And because of our size, we can nowadays negotiate competitive arrangements at some of the best resorts on the Continent."

Hourmont are well endowed with ski-ing experience. Their Chief Executives in Austria and France are both qualified instructors. Recently Mr. Peter Gambles former P.E. Advisor to Buckingham Education Authority and an experienced skier, joined the company to further strengthen their management team.

Quality at Low Cost

Cost is probably the overriding consideration with schools when deciding whether or not to ski. Hourmont's prices are low because the number of children they send abroad enables them to offer long seasons and regular business to their airlines and hoteliers.

Proof that low prices and high quality can be achieved was recently shown in an independent survey of teachers who travelled last season. Hourmont hotels, travel arrangements and resort representatives were found to be significantly superior to those of a major competitor. Surcharges due to the oil crisis and the 'floating £' made the recent winter sports season one of the most difficult ever for the travel industry. But it is significant that the surcharges made by Hourmont were often half those charged by other companies. Another example say Hourmont, of their constant concern for their schools at all times.

The new Hourmont brochure, Ski-ing for Schools 75/76, is available now. Write or telephone for a copy to:-

For stay-at-homes

The Spey Valley has much to offer—besides skiing, writes Dudley Wilson

With continental ski weeks leaping in cost and a final price often worryingly uncertain, more schools will be looking at skiing possibilities in Scotland. North of the Border we face no worries over passports or exchange rates. Frighteningly costly items abroad like soft drinks and use of tows or lifts are largely curbed at home where they can be more precisely predicted.

At home the Spey Valley is undoubtedly the place to go: it has the widest selection of resorts, accommodation, and things to see or do and is best geared to skiers of all levels. School parties are finding much in its favour, not least the fine tuition available at nine ski schools and the ski lifts which now include four chair-type and seven tows rising to the Ptarmigan snack bar at 3,600ft, less than 500 ft from the summit of Cairngorm itself.

Conditions this year have been good, with fair snow and little wind. National newspapers give daily snow reports on Cairngorm conditions. The valley has enjoyed its busiest and most successful season since extensive tourist development.

I select three arrangements which strike me as soundly organized, carefully planned and representing good value. Others exist and my suggestions in no way invalidate those not mentioned. First is Aviemore Chalets Motel, adjoining Aviemore Centre, with its splendid range of facilities including skating and curling rink, squash courts, heated swimming pool, sauna and solarium, cinema, shops and restaurants. The artificial ski slope is a boon in really bad weather aloft or for novices.

Curling has recently spruced up its image and is no longer the preserve of scowling veterans. Schools can arrange competitions on the first-rate indoor rink with seven curling lanes (stones and brooms provided). Aviemore Centre ensures that disappointments of curtailed skiing are cut to a minimum: there is something to do day and night.

The chalets are warm and comfortable, Swiss style, each with four sturdy bunk beds, quilts, tartan covers, ample storage, washbasins, private shower, WC and drying arrangements. The motel is popular Central reception areas provide snack bar, television and lounge used for lectures or films when required. Meals are taken at the Pinewood Restaurant near by, packed lunches, of course, being carried to the slopes.

Special school party (minimum 16 children) price for 1975/76 will be around £35 for five days, about £45 for seven days to include full board, daily ski instruction, hire of skis, sticks and boots, unlimited use of ski lifts, VAT* and use of most centre facilities. Extras here would be daily bus transport to and from the slopes. There is a regular service (present children's fare 30p return).

Instruction is in capable hands, with Aviemore Ski School using the short ski method. Derek Brightman, a member of the international team first to ski down Mont Blanc's north face, heads a team of keen yet kindly instructors. Arrangements at Aviemore Chalets Motel run from December to May but exclude Christmas/New Year and Easter. To book or obtain further details and exact prices write to the Manager, Harry Abrahams, who has already taken many repeat bookings from schools. Accompanying staff are charged the same rate as children (two with each 16 children).

My second selection is the Scottish Youth Hostels Association's ski courses at their Loch Morlich Grade 1 standard hostel, ideally situated en route to the slopes. The hostel is well equipped with full drying and showering, so essential to skiers. Courses run weekly from December 27 to April 10 and prices, Saturday supper to the following Saturday after breakfast, will be £31.75 (16-20 age group), £31 (12-15) and £32.50 for adults. (Children aged five to 11 can be considered only if they bring their own equipment.)

These prices include all meals, transfers from Aviemore station to Loch Morlich, daily trips to the mountainside, ski instruction for five days, VAT*, and hire of boots, skis and sticks for the week. Extras would be chair and ski lift charges at £4.50 a seven-day junior ticket. Contact for details of courses and booking Scottish Youth Hostels Association, 161 Warrender Park Road, Edinburgh EH9 1EQ. The leader or school will have to join the association.

My last choice is the school programme of Weekend World's "Getaway" ski packages. Their's is the only arrangement which includes travel to and from the Spey Valley. From London, by rail, a five-day package at around £55 in the coming season offers each child all transport, dinner, bed and breakfast at the admirable Highlander Motel, Newtonmore, where parties are well looked after by Mr and Mrs Whetton, daily instruction by Ski School d'Ecosse, equipment hire and transfers to Cairngorm.

Weekend World also uses other hotels round about but the Highlander acts as their headquarters and ski depot. Extras will be snack lunches on the slopes, where there is ample provision, and lifts. Coach travel may be a little cheaper. The organizers will visit any school to discuss plans, prices and give a quotation. Contact "Weekend World (Leisure)", 48 George Street, London, W1 (01-935 2244).

A school or party leader usually has to join the Weekend World Club at an annual membership fee of £2. For parties of 30 or more free places and travel for staff are provided at a ratio of one to 15 children. Train travel to Speyside is either overnight by "Royal Highlander" or by the day "Clansman" taking just under 10 hours to Newtonmore.

To leave England and wake up in the Highlands is a thrilling experience and the journey by day a fine scenic trip, particularly Cumbria's Lune Gorge, over Beattock and through Killiecrankie. "Weekend World" are friendly people and can arrange pony trekking, which has been going strong at Newtonmore for more than 20 years, mountain or forest walks and for the bad weather day, a tour of Aviemore ski factory, where the complete process of ski manufacture is interesting.

There is much more to the Spey Valley than skiing. I have mentioned the excellent Aviemore Centre. "Landmark", at Carrbridge, with exhibitions, multi-screen film theatre, book and craft shop, restaurant and nature trail giving a full session's concentrated appreciation of Highland life, history and wild life is clearly well worth a school visit. The Kingussie Highland Wild Life Park (open from early spring) has some 26 species of mammals and 24 of birds in their natural habitat.

A ski holiday in the Cairngorms can be basis of a regional study with a dip into history at Culloden Field or the ruins of Ruthven Barracks.

Youngsters relish, too, the genuine vigour of Scottish après-ski night life from inevitable disco to lively folk evenings and unique ceilidhs. Parties can be disappointed by a shortage of snow but this happens elsewhere, too. The Spey Valley offers good back-up facilities at low cost.

Norway's variety. By Jane Monro, assistant editor, Ski survey

A Norwegian rock carving shows that 4,000 years ago men travelled and hunted on skis—and today thousands of Norwegians ski from one place to another, but for pleasure rather than from necessity. Many of their mountains are high plateaus with steep sides into the valleys, so first-day skiers are safe up on top.

Voss, one of the country's major ski resorts, lies only 500 miles from the Arctic Circle and 57 metres above sea level, yet it offers a variety of skiing rarely enjoyed at Alpine resorts. The ski school is 700 metres above the town, the instructors speak fluent English—and want to teach. Beginners can try cross-country skiing first as the equipment is lighter and more comfortable than "downhill" skis and boots. The heels are free, with only the toes clamped under the binding, so the legs can take long strides in the rhythmic, loping gait which is surprisingly unexhausting for the speed. But a gentle walk is equally enjoyable, for it gives time to admire the countryside.

Some tracks are marked, others are made by skiers exploring new territory—ski orienteering—with a map and compass. This is popular with Scandinavian children, who go off in small groups, each skier with a rucksack containing spare clothing, food and ski wax. Waxing is an art, for as the temperature of the snow changes a different wax might prove more effective. And a pause for waxing is a tactful stop if there are slow skiers, besides allowing time to reconsider the map and route. Terrain looks very different under snow and landmarks such as streams are sometimes hidden, until discovered by falling in.

Ski orienteering with map and compass is increasingly popular and good fun whether competitive or not.

For a school group Voss could be the answer. Beginners will be well instructed, the less athletic getting their confidence on gently undulating cross country tracks before donning heavy ski boots and being firmly attached to downhill skis. Those who reckon on clocking up as many downhill metres as possible can "pistebash", using the chair and T-lifts. They will be safe venturing off the pistes, as crevasses are non-existent and many locals have never seen an avalanche.

The people are delightfully friendly and eager to speak English, so there is no difficulty about buying a toothbrush except that it will cost three times as much as in England. Although the pound buys 11 or 12 krone, its comparative value is much less.

However there are ways of staying without paying for unwanted luxuries. The Voss Youth Hostel has two, four and 12-bedded rooms and offers bed and three meals a day for kr40 in January, rising during the Christmas and Easter holidays to kr49. (These prices are likely to rise by 1976).

Voss also arranges an economical snowpack for school parties: 10 days hire of skis, sticks and boots, lift pass and tuition cost kr 370, a saving of kr200 on the standard prices. Alternatively the Norwegian State Railways run holidays with SAS Scandinavian Airlines, flying from London to Bergen, and with the Bergen and Fred Olsen Lines, which involves a 24-hour crossing from Newcastle to Bergen. Flying costs about £7 more, but saves a day each end of the holiday. A 10-day holiday in a four or six bedded motel room would be £89 for travel and demi-pension, to which should be added the £31 snowpack.

Travel to Scandinavia is neither as frequent nor as cheap as to the European alps, but at Voss each can ski according to his ability. Skiers in Norway are relatively un-fashion conscious, compared with those in southern Europe and, which is a great advantage, Norway and Britain have a reciprocal national health service. The general Norwegian-British rapport certainly helps to make a good holiday, and with so many varieties in the type of skiing Norway offers the ideal scope for a party of young skiers.

Off the piste

The joys of touring. By Alison Riddell

Think of a skiing holiday, and what comes to mind? Sun and snow, mountains and tranquillity—and wonderful, glorious exhilaration. Or perhaps your mind's eye turns to visions of crowded trains, lifts, pistes, cafes and bars, and your pocket shrinks at the mere thought of it all.

All too often nowadays skiing involves too much rushing and hurrying in order to get to the front of the queue—and too much expense, which is why I first decided to try touring. I had already done a few day tours—which is most advisable if one is to be used to skiing with a rucksack and using skins before setting off for a week or more. And a first mountain climbed, however easy, and the subsequent ski down is a memorable experience; the feeling of superiority with which one finally rejoins the piste, rucksack on back and skins tied round waist, is well earned.

But getting to the top of a mountain is not always necessary; the sheer joy of wandering in the deep snow, skimming through the powder, over humps and bumps, round bushes and rocks in terrain perhaps impassable in summer, and leaving one's tracks (for what they are worth) on the face of the mountain, is something not to be missed. Although I do have memories of the long, slow, seemingly endless climbs on skins during my tour, they are far outweighed by the recollection of the new valleys seen and the new vistas opening up, as one finally reaches a col and prepares for the wonderful long run down to the next hut.

Among popular touring areas are the Valais and the Bernese Oberland in Switzerland, not forgetting the famous Haute Route from Chamonix to Saas Fee, and the Silvretta, the Bernina, and the Oetztal area in Austria which I chose.

We took 12 days, starting from Obergurgl and ending at Solden, and stayed in seven different mountain huts. Our highest peak was the Wildspitze (3,772m)—and, as the second highest in Austria, it was very, very cold on top. I was surprised to find that most of the huts were very comfortable with electric light, menus to choose from, and sometimes even hot water, so we were lucky in that we did not have to carry a lot of food as sometimes happens if you tour in an area where the huts are smaller or unguarded. The food was good, only lacking in things like fresh salads and fresh fruit—a permanent deep freeze outside in the snow keeps bread fairly fresh for a long time. We slept in matrazenlager which means bunk beds in dormitories—blankets provided but no sheets. If that does not sound too comfortable let me stress that, after a long day of climbing and skiing, it felt like complete luxury.

New valleys and new vistas . . . a view of the Hochwilde glacier.

Only once did we have to fend for ourselves when we used the Winter Room of the Hochwilde Hutte. As there were just eight beds and 11 people, the unlucky ones slept on the cracks between the bunks—but we were all beautifully warm and fell asleep among the fumes of our weinerli and green pea soup supper.

The day started at a fairly reasonable hour—around 7 am when we would fix our skins, heave on rucksacks and set off towards the next pass, like a string of camels, plodding across the glacier and zigzagging upwards. We had a few very steep climbs when we carried our skis, and slowly heaved ourselves up from foothole to foothole, dripping with perspiration, sun beating down and, nearby, the ice gleaming in gaping crevasses. However, it all becomes worthwhile when the top is finally reached (and it always is) and one is rewarded by a long run down to the next hut, the brewing up of the wasser—and a cosy evening ahead.

We had to be able to ski in all sorts of snow: wind-blown, crust, powder, slush, spring snow—one of the thrills on a tour is the unexpected powder slope, and one of the satisfactions is choosing the snow that will hold and avoiding the breakable crust. You must be prepared for all weathers and snow conditions; spring is the season for touring so it could be very hot but equally well it could be very, very cold and you may find yourself beginning the day at dawn wearing a thick balaclava and changing it later on, as the sun gets up, for a shady sunhat.

The Ski Club of Great Britain organizes several tours each season and can supply valuable information on clothing and equipment. If you want to try ski touring and have passed the British second class ski test and are reasonably fit, then you should have no problems.

Once off the piste there is no looking back . . . skiing ceases to be merely a sport, it becomes a whole way of life.

Club Mediterranée in winter

Not everyone knows that Club Med is not all straw huts and beachcombing. Elisabeth Hussey, editor, 'Ski Survey' describes a skiing holiday in Livigno

It was like walking into a wall of sound. The tables were full of noisy revellers, dressed curiously in clothes reminiscent of the 1920s and sitting relaxed among the remnants of what looked like a great feast. The noise was brought to a climax by a group, wandering from table to table and playing an assortment of instruments which seemed to belong to another, more ancient civilization.

Although we had arrived late (our aircraft from London to Milan had been delayed and the coach journey along beautiful Lake Como and the Valtellina had lasted nearly six hours) we were quickly settled at a table and plied with the most splendid food and drink. Our Club Mediterranée holiday in Livigno had started in the middle of a "1920" evening, complete with special cabaret and an Andean band.

Next day we began to discover what Club Mediterranée is all about. We came in to breakfast and found long tables with bowls of fruit, plates of sausage and salami, eggs, cheese, rolls, butter and jam. There was coffee, chocolate or tea to drink. Tables are laid for eight people and are filled in turn as people come into the restaurant, so as there were two of us, we met six more people at every meal and within a few days we felt we knew everyone in the village.

Lunch and dinner also started with a tremendous serve-yourself hors d'oeuvres, followed by a hot course and finishing with cheese and fruit. On each table were jugs of wine, mineral water and apple juice. As soon as these emptied they were refilled by the red-jerseyed waiters.

Food was definitely a great feature of the holiday, and as people talked freely, meals made good meeting places. If you talk French it helps (and German, too, for many of the guests were Belgian or German). But if you talk only English there is no need to feel left out. Everyone seems to want to practise their English and although we only met two compatriots in Livigno there were plenty of people to talk to.

Going up in the ski lift with a Belgian boy next morning, I asked about the ski school. We had met the chief instructor and I had been assigned to Class 2 with a French-Canadian moniteur. Club Mediterranée bring their own instructors from France rather than using local ones. The Belgian boy was enthusiastic. The instruction, he assured me, was not "maniac". The aim was to enjoy yourself but he had also learnt a lot. After a few days in the school, I agreed with him. I had thoroughly enjoyed skiing with the experienced eye of Jean picking out my faults and helping me to correct them. I had never been really tired or scared but I knew I was skiing better than before.

Club Mediterranée run their own races for the club symbol (a trident) and also the French tests for Chamois, so there is plenty to aim for. Classes were well sorted into comparable groups and a board in the bar was changed every evening to show which classes, with which instructors, were going to which ski areas the next day and at what time their buses would leave the village. All this organization went very smoothly.

I had always wanted to try langlauf skiing and at the Club Med all I had to do was to fit skis and boots in the ski room one evening and set off next morning along the woodland paths with an instructor and an assortment of garrulous, cheerful French skiers.

Livigno is a long straggly village between St Moritz and Bormio (although there is no road down to St Moritz). The skiing, which is varied and spread over a wide area without ever being very difficult, is served by two main lift systems, one owned by Italians and the other by Germans. Normally one requires two separate lift passes but Club Mediterranée issue their members with a pass covering one side and tickets for the other are distributed whenever a class goes on those lifts. There is no ski school on Sundays. Livigno is also a duty-free zone, so it is a great place for buying watches and cameras, and drinks are very cheap.

One of the great features of Club Mediterranée is the number of things which are included in the cost of your holiday. For a week in Livigno the cost, not including the journey, was between £54 and £70 last year. This may seem high compared with some package holidays but food and wine, accommodation, ski school abonnements (except on Sunday) and also many other things are included (but not ski and boot hire*).

After skiing you can swim in the heated pool, and one evening I tried the Yoga class—standing on one's head is definitely restful for the ankles after a day's skiing. Classical music sessions were organized, and films were shown. If you want to see yourself ski you ask the video man and he takes your class next day, showing the result in the bar during the evening. Races are also videoed.

From two to five times a week a cabaret is put on by the Chef du Village and his team of organizers. The ski instructors join in with this, as they do in all aspects of village life. The dozens of children in the Club Mediterranée village were kept busy skiing all day and happily occupied with their own "mini-club" in the evenings.

Club Mediterranée summer holidays have a great reputation for thatched hut togetherness, and on our way to Livigno we had wondered how this would transfer to the mountains. Well, there was every opportunity to get to know people as well as you like, but on the whole the bacchanalian aspects of the village were mainly centred on wine and fruit.

"Food was definitely a great feature of the holiday."

If you would like to know more about this type of holiday, write to Club Mediterranée at 5 South Molton St, London W1Y 1DH.

 During the winter season 1974/75 fibreglass skis could be hired for about £10 a week, metal and cross-country skis for about £6, children's skis for £4, and boots for about £4 a week.*

'All you need to know'

We Learned to Ski. By Harold Evans, Brian Jackman and Mark Ottaway of The Sunday Times. Collins £3.50. 0 00 216 746/8.

This is an enormously comprehensive production about an enormously complex subject. It contains, I am sure, more words and more pictures about how a would-be skier should equip himself, and then learn how to use his equipment, than anyone has ever attempted to place between two covers, yet, the sequence, the advice and the reasoning are simple, logical and easy to read and understand.

Read this book and it will, as it says without a blush on the front cover, "Tell you all you need to know". This could well be because the three authors (and their photographers and advisers) not only obviously had a great deal of enthusiasm—regardless of their own widely varying degrees of competence on skis—to share and to pass on. They were also able to pool a reservoir of intellect and descriptive talent that hitherto has not been available in this particular snowfield.

The result is excellent—and The Sunday Times is to be congratulated. Anyone who suffers from, or wants to suffer from, that intoxicating and highly infectious disease called Ski Fever should read it. It will take you step by step verbally and visually through all the questions of equipment, tuition and technique and, practically speaking, all the other relevant mysteries to do with skiing. Bear in mind, however, two things. First, for someone who has had absolutely no experience or knowledge of the sport, this book would be a considerable mouthful. Second, it is no handbook for the learner or the goodish skier to carry around in his anorak for easy consultation. It would not even fit into a bumbag. This is a rucksack job. In size and weight it reminds me somewhat of a breeze block.

My own belief is that nothing, ski-ing or bee keeping, can be learnt initially from reading, and that one ounce of actual experience is worth at least a ton of armchair study. My advice, therefore, would be to read this book immediately after your first serious differences of opinion with a pair of ski. Those with experience, little or a lot, need not delay.

I only have a couple of small criticisms to offer. The photographs do insufficient justice to the beauty of sunshine on snow, and "natural skiing" rather than "style skiing" could do with a bit more emphasis. These, however, are trifling points, and I fully expect, provided the world stays sane, that enough "breeze blocks" will be sold to build a great big wall all the way out to the Alps.

However there are still too many so-called experts in this country and many ski shops in the Alps who do not yet understand fully what is meant by using short skis. They advise a shorter length of a normal ski regardless of the individual's height, weight or age.

The proper short ski is one specially made and generally is a stiffer ski to ensure distribution of weight along its full length. The width of a short ski should not be wider than a normal ski (although some are) as this does not enable the skier to edge with precision. The Continental manufacturers are still arguing about the technical structure of short skis (160, 170, 180 cm) but whatever the outcome short skis are here to stay.

National conference

The Sports Council, in conjunction with the West Midlands and on behalf of the English Ski Committee of the National Ski Federation of Great Britain, are organizing a national ski conference at Aston University, Birmingham, on September 20-21, 1975. Lord Orr-Ewing, president, NSFGB, will open the conference and it is hoped that 200 people from regional ski associations, clubs, local authorities and l.e.a.s will attend. Details and application forms can be obtained from David Francis, Senior Regional Officer, The West Midlands Sports Council, Crest House, 7 Highfield Road, Birmingham B15 3EG.

CUMBRIA
EDUCATION COMMITTEE
ST. BENEDICT'S HIGH SCHOOL
Whitehaven
(Voluntary Aided, 11 to 16 mixed, 950 on roll)

Required September, 1975, TEACHER of ART to work with pupils of all abilities and ages within the school. The person appointed will have the use of a large, well-equipped Art Room with pottery area and kiln, and will have considerable freedom to develop the subject according to his or her own special interests. He/she will be a member of a team of seven Art Teachers. Salary Scale 1.

St. Benedict's was opened at Easter, 1971 and is an 11 to 16 mixed school which draws in all the Catholic children of Whitehaven. It at present transfers pupils at 13 plus and 16 plus by Guided Parental Choice to a 13 to 18 school. Extensions are scheduled to begin in the present building year, which, it is expected, will lead to an expansion of the school, by the amalgamation with St. Cuthbert's Cleator Moor, to approximately 900 pupils by 1977 and shortly afterwards, to 1,400 pupils when the 13 plus Guided Parental Choice transfer will cease. A period of considerable change, challenge, and opportunity, therefore lies ahead.

St. Benedict's is situated in pleasant surroundings on the outskirts of Whitehaven, and is most convenient for the Cumbrian Coast and the Western Lakes. Further details may be obtained from the Headmaster, at the school (phone 0946 4688).

Application forms, obtainable from R. G. Powell, Assistant Director of Education, West Division, Union Hall, Scotch Street, Whitehaven, to be returned to the Headmaster, [illegible] 1975.

HIGH CROSS SCHOOL
High Road, Tottenham, N.17
(Seven-form entry Girls' Comprehensive School)

This school has recently been designated one of Social Priority and this post carries an additional allowance of £201 £276 per annum.

Required for September—

HEAD of BUSINESS STUDIES. Houghton Scale 4.

This is virtually a new post, as we wish to expand the Department beyond the teaching of Office skills. Applicants would be expected to plan a full and imaginative Business Studies course which would take account of the importance of personal and social knowledge and of the skills needed in employment. Close cooperation would be needed with the well-established Social Studies/Economics Department.

These subjects are taught to all fourth and fifth form pupils and a Mode 3 C.S.E. is in operation. The Department would be accommodated in a separate annexe near the Sixth Form block and it would be the responsibility of the teacher appointed to design the layout of these rooms and to equip them. Initially the major part of the work would be in the Sixth Form, where there is a keen demand, but private courses need to be established in fourth and fifth years as well.

In the first instance letters of application giving curriculum vitae and names of two referees should be sent within seven days of the appearance of the advertisement to the Headmistress at the school.

Removal expenses—100 per cent allowed. London Allowance (£351) payable.

CUMBRIA
KIRKBY STEPHEN GRAMMAR SCHOOL
Kirkby Stephen
(County, 11 to 18 mixed. Roll 400)

Required for September in this rural comprehensive school, TEACHER of MATHEMATICS to C.S.E. Some "O" and "A" level available to a suitable candidate. Possibility of Houghton Scale 2. Good amenities, magnificent country.

Application forms obtainable from the Headmaster, R. H. Coates, at the school, to whom they should be returned.

CUMBRIA
ST. AIDAN'S SCHOOL
Carlisle
Head: N. D. Sidaway, B.A.
(Mixed 11-16, 1,300 pupils)

Fully comprehensive, non-denominational, on one site, organised pastorally in three horizontal schools, and academically in seven faculties. Carlisle is a Cathedral City with a Teachers' Centre, and is within easy reach of the M.6 and the Lake District.

Required for September, 1975, as SECOND in the DEPARTMENT, GRADUATE TEACHER of MATHEMATICS (Houghton) Scale 2.

The school has access to computer facilities and modern syllabuses are followed throughout the school. C.S.E. Mode 1 "O" and "A" level work are well established. Mode 3 C.S.E. and C.E.E. are planned, and there is considerable scope for the development of new courses and methods.

The person appointed will teach at all levels and will take responsibility for a negotiable, sizable section of the work of the Department, such as Lower School Mathematics or C.S.E. work, etc.

Application forms and further details from the Head, St. Aidan's School, Carlisle CA1 1LY.

CUMBRIA
ST. BENEDICT'S R.C. HIGH SCHOOL
Whitehaven
(Voluntary Aided: 11-16. Mixed: Roll 550)

Required September, 1975. HEAD OF MATHEMATICS DEPARTMENT. (Scale 3 Houghton). It is hoped to appoint a person of experience, enthusiasm and proven ability with powers of leadership to develop the Department to its fullest potential.

St. Benedict's was opened at Easter 1971, and is an 11-16 Mixed school which takes in all the Catholic children of Whitehaven. It at present transfers pupils at 13 plus and 16 plus by Guided Choice to a 13-18 school. Extensions are scheduled to begin in the present building year, which, it is expected, will lead to an expansion of the school, by the amalgamation with St. Cuthberts', Cleator Moor, to approximately 900 pupils by 1977, and, it is hoped, to 1,050 pupils shortly afterwards, when the 13 plus Guided transfer will cease. A period of considerable change, challenge and opportunity therefore lies ahead.

Because of the proposed changes in the nature of theschool, the person appointed to this post can be appointed as Head of Mathematics only until the date of the amalgamation. A subsequent re-application from a successful Head of Mathematics would of course receive serious consideration.

St. Benedicts' is situated in pleasant surroundings on the outskirts of Whitehaven and is most convenient for the Cumbrian Coast and the Western Lakes. Further details may be obtained from the Headmaster at the school (Phone 0946 4680).

Application forms obtainable from R. G. Powell, Assistant Director of Education, West Division, Union Hall, Scotch Street, Whitehave, to be returned to the Headmaster, J. McCarren at the school by 16th May, 1975.

CUMBRIA
ST. BENEDICT'S HIGH SCHOOL
Whitehaven
(Voluntary Aided: 11-16 Mixed: 650 on roll)

Required September, 1975, TEACHER of FRENCH. The person appointed will be expected to teach French to the comprehensive intake in the first two years—all pupils do three years Primary French (En Avant)—and to those in Fourth and Fifth years who choose to take the subject to C.S.E. standard. The Nuffield French Scheme is followed as a basic course, and a 32-booth language laboratory is available. Salary Scale 1.

St. Benedict's was opened at Easter, 1971, and is an 11-16 mixed school which takes in all the Catholic children of Whitehaven. It at present transfers pupils at 13 plus and 16 plus by Guided Parental Choice to a 13-18 school. Extensions are scheduled to begin in the present building year, which it is expected, will lead to an expansion of the school by the amalgamation with St. Cuthbert's, Cleator Moor, to approximately 900 pupils by 1977, and it is hoped to 1,050 pupils shortly afterwards, when the 13 plus Guided Parental Choice transfer will cease. A period of considerable change, challenge and opportunity therefore lies ahead.

St. Benedict's is situated in pleasant surroundings on the outskirts of Whitehaven and is most convenient for the Cumbrian coast and the Western lakes. Further details may be obtained from the Headmaster at the school (phone 0946-4688).

Application forms obtainable from R. O. Powell, Assistant Director of Education, Western Division, Union Hall, Scotch Street, Whitehaven, to be returned to the Headmaster, J. McCarron, at the school by 9th May, 1975.

POETRY

ECLECTIC FESTIVAL

Shirley Toulson

New literary festivals are common enough these days, but the one that was launched at Cambridge last weekend was notable for being both parochial and international, and for providing a meeting place for all the varying forms of poetry, whose bitter conflicts so often puzzle the common reader. This made it rare.

It was parochial in that many of the 60 or so poets participating at the festival had some links with Cambridge. "You won't find the London literary establishment here," Elizabeth Thomas of The New Statesman and chairman of the festival committee told me. Indeed none of The New Review poets were about, but this did not mean that established names were excluded. Ted Hughes, who has long literary ties with the University was an obvious choice; and among the older poets it was good to find David Gascoyne, and John Heath-Stubbs reading extracts from his epic Artorius.

The international element in the festival was made up of poets from Italy, Sweden and Greece; while the questions raised by the translations of verse were discussed at one of the afternoon seminars led by Elaine Feinstein (the poet and novelist who has done some remarkable translations of Russian poetry). Michael Hamburger (well known for his translations from German); and the Greek poet, Nikos Stangos. At a later session Anne Beresford read some translations from Roumanian poetry, which were originally published in the magazine, Agenda.

That journal was one of many small press magazines and books which the festival will have helped to become more widely known. It was in this area that the organizers were most successful in the difficult task of providing a meeting place for "experimental" and traditional verse forms. The conflict between these two aspects of poetry was naturally much discussed. It is a debate to which the Northern Ireland poet Michael Longley probably gave the final answer. "You have possibly noted that the poetry that comes out of Northern Ireland is formal", he told his audience, "perhaps you need a lot of leisure and peace to be experimental".

Cambridge had room for everyone. There was an exhibition of work from the little presses at Heffer's bookshop. Among the many visitors who came to look at their heterogeneous productions were the children, who last Saturday collected the book tokens which they had won in a poetry competition organized by The Cambridge Evening News in conjunction with the festival. Some 400 poems were submitted, and these were all read and judged by Raymond O'Malley of Cambridge University Department of Education and director of studies in English at Selwyn College. "Some of the poems came from the schools", he told me "but a lot were just sent in from home". He has edited a selection of the poems that were submitted, Many Coloured Glass (published for the Cambridge Poetry Festival by Cambridge Aids to Learing Ltd, 18 King Street, Cambridge at 30p). It forms a good footnote to the eclectic nature of the whole festival. There is a shape poem, set in the form of a hovering kestrel, from a 10-year-old boy, and some intricate and telling rhyme schemes among the expected free verse.

Apart from the bookshop exhibitions and the popular poetry events which were held at the Union, the festival was also celebrated by a performance of dance and poetry at the Corn Exchange. These were choreographed by Diana Theodores, Liebe King and No'omi Doordivani. Poetry's link with the visual arts was represented by several gallery exhibitions of pictures by poets, most notably Charles Tomlinson and David Jones.

The work of the latter was among the very best of the many good things in Cambridge last weekend. It was put on at Kettle Yard Gallery, and visitors were able to hear recordings of the poet's work in a room hung with his intricate, elusive and oddly powerful watercolour, chalk and pencil pictures. The exhibition was not the only tribute to his work during the festival. His poetry was the subject of a lecture by Jeremy Hooker, and a passage from his last book, The Sleeping Lord, was read by William Cookson, editor of Agenda, who first published parts of the poem in his magazine 10 years ago. Small wonder that there was much talk in Cambridge about the posthumous publication next month of David Jones's Kensington Mass, and that considerable interest was aroused when Mr Cookson confirmed that about 60 pages of the poet's autobiography, as well as other fragments, are still awaiting publication.

Strangely Agenda was criticized by some of the audience for "steering away from the margins of experiment", for that magazine has constantly given space to considerations of the work of two of the greatest experimental poets of the century: David Jones, himself, and Ezra Pound. Pound's son Omar, who now lectures at the Cambridge Technical College, prepared one of the poster poems designed for the festival; and he is to be the first poet to take part in the Cambridge Festival which falls this year between July 12 and 27.

That festival is an established event, and up till now no poetry has been included. Its absence was one of the reasons why the Cambridge Poetry Festival was set up. It is the brainchild of Richard Burns, who also lectures at the Technical College. He and his committee spent two years organizing last week's events. They hope it will now become a biennial festival. Judging from the enthusiastic reception given to last week's readings and discussions, the scheme has been well launched. A lot of people will be looking forward to 1977.

THEATRE

ON PINTER'S ISLAND

John Peter

Harold Pinter's new play is called No Man's Land—a title which hints at remoteness, danger and unreality; at something both claustrophobic and hostile. In fact John Bury's settings at the Old Vic breathe an air of meticulous reality. The curtain rises on a large room with a vast bay window in what turns out to be a Hampstead house. The furnishings are functional and old-fashioned, with spare trendy touches. Some shelves hold Delft plates and bottles of whisky. A drink-laden table. A small oil painting, tastefully lit. Two elderly men.

Hirst (Ralph Richardson) is, it transpires, a wealthy man of letters. He encountered Spooner (John Gielgud) in a pub and brought him home for a drink. Spooner is a quintessential Fitzrovian literary derelict; loquacious, shabby and aggressively self-deprecating, an emotional outcast vainly pretending to misanthropy. Hirst is a laconic brooder, with an old-fashioned air of command which easily disintegrates: a captive Prospero attended by a secretary and a manservant of doubtful allegiance, rather like a sinister Ariel and a devious Caliban.

Did Hirst bring Spooner to his island? Or had Spooner always, in some manner, been there? The cast-iron certainties of the opening soon begin to weaken: the two old men circle each other now in fearful reconnaissance, now in terrible familiarity.

Of course, part of the play's interest lies in its echoes of Pinter's previous works. Hirst and his servants recall the embattled autocracy of Max over his sons in The Homecoming; Spooner's encounter with them reminds one of the trapped Davies in The Caretaker and the interrogation of Stanley in The Birthday Party. The earlier plays have been called dramatizations of the territorial instinct (written long before the term came into intellectual fashion): you may have wondered who their characters were and where they had sprung from but there was an animal certainty about their purposes. Spooner, too, seems to be an invader, bedraggled and cantankerous, scenting a protective lair.

But is he? There are times when he seems to be part of Hirst's past life, and Hirst to be part of his. More than any of Pinter's plays No Man's Land is full of abrupt contradictions which do not quite negate each other. Its texture is like that of a dream: note, indeed, that the action is twice punctuated by someone (first Hirst, then Spooner) waking up from a sleep. Are they, then awake? Hirst comes in, talking of a dream he has just had: a waterfall, a lake, someone drowning. "It was I", says Spooner, "drowning in your dream." The image recurs at the close of the play, more haunting, more ambiguous. So is it a dream Hirst recalls or is it a memory? And who is Spooner that he should be able to share it?

No Man's Land is a dream-play in a deep and unsettling sense: not simply because its events have the peremptory contradictions and the hideous logic of some dreams, but, much more, because its characters seem to dream each other's existence. Pinter's imagination has created a dramatic image of life as a shared dream: both elusive and intimately real. And it is the proof of his consummate craftsmanship that he can still maintain his characters as utterly real creatures.

Hirst and Spooner have a human solidity which is almost Dickensian; and Pinter maintains their hold over us (though this hold sags a little towards the end of Act One) with a dialogue written in superbly rhythmic and tensely dramatic prose. No one except Beckett writes such pointed, economic, hilarious and musical English for the theatre today: language which both reveals character and creates a deeply subjective poetry.

It also creates superb acting parts; and in Peter Hall's scrupulously attentive hands the production becomes an outstanding achievement. Mr Hall is a musical man and he pays meticulous attention to Pinter's cunning cadences. He is aided by Michael Feast and Terence Rigby who, as the attendant thugs, display Pinter's familiar range of polished aggression; and by Ralph Richardson's Hirst: a masterpiece of sombre, disdainful introspection, using silences, questioning looks, expressions of indifference and of savagely controlled amazement with the awesome dexterity of a fencer. He is partnered by John Gielgud's masterly Spooner. Devious, shambling and self-lacerating, his character is perfectly expressed by his body. Observe the way the sandalled feet slide forward, the legs insinuating the body; the way the hands are held in gestures convinced of their own graciousness, or hitching up the trousers aggressively, as if to bolster dwindling confidence; the face, puckering up in arrogant self-pity; the slope of the shoulders declaring genteel breeding. Here are two very great actors in perfect command of their subtle and difficult craft; one feels moved and privileged to have seen them.

EAST ANGLIAN MISCELLANY

David Self

Ever since Akenfield, we've all had a particular mental picture of Suffolk: muted colours and slow-speaking rustics. We might therefore expect The Regional Theatre of Suffolk to specialize in mummers' plays and the occasional agricultural documentary. In fact, the Regional Theatre of Suffolk is also the Ipswich Theatre and it offers a lively and varied programme.

Now in repertory is a brave and intelligent production of T. S. Eliot's Family Reunion. Some might think it box office lunacy to tackle a verse play which its author has labelled "defective" in an essay demonstrating its unstageworthiness. But at Ipswich, Giles Block effectively crystallizes the uncertainties of the protagonist, Harry; and director John Southworth has done much to adjust the trappings of a Greek tragedy (the Chorus, the manifestations of the Eumenides) to a modern situation. (In dim twilight these pursuant spirits materialize as a sort of phallic ectoplasm.)

Eliot believed he had written a script that was hopelessly overdemanding. The Ipswich company has risen to its demands to discover that today's audiences (perhaps thanks to the techniques of television drama and that medium's preoccupation with what is going on inside people's heads as opposed to strong plot lines) are ready to accept the surrealist Family Reunion.

Even so, Family Reunion is not perhaps the ideal play to which to take the fifth form at the beginning of the Summer term, but following it (May 7-24) is The Ghost Train by Arnold Ridley (Godfrey in Dad's Army): "With its combination of comedy, ghost story and thriller, it makes an ideal introduction to theatre for young people of any age from eleven upwards."

To complete its season, Ipswich Theatre is presenting Waiting for Godot for one week and then taking the play on tour around East Anglia, performing where requested. Have minibus, will travel.

East Anglian theatres are shining brightly at the moment. The Arts, Cambridge, is host to the London Contemporary Dance Theatre (April 28-May 3) and the ubiquitous Godspell (May 12-26); the Theatre Royal Norwich welcomes the National Theatre's Heartbreak House (May 13-19); and the recently refurbished Theatre Royal at Bury St Edmunds offers the Belt and Braces Road Show (April 28-30) and the New Shakespeare Company in Taming of the Shrew (May 12-17) while from May 6-10 Westley Middle School is bringing The Wizard of Oz to the public boards.

TELEVISION

REFUSING TO FACE AWKWARD QUESTIONS

"This is very much a BBC programme. We're discussing the future of a very large car company without any of the people who actually make cars in the factories." Thus Tony Wedgwood Benn in the special Money Programme produced to commemorate "a turning point in the history of the British motor industry" or, who knows, another stage in its collapse.

Tony Wedgwood Benn's method is always arresting, and whether or not he was unfair on this occasion, with one union official present from the AUEW and an earlier appearance during the evening of a car factory shop steward, does not too much matter. It is always worth questioning the structure of programmes, and Bob Mackenzie seemed well able to look after himself.

The trouble with the Wedgwood Benn intervention this time was that instead of turning discussion to the "real issues" it served (consciously or unconsciously) to block one of the clearly important, if politically inconvenient, issues—overmanning.

Wedgwood Benn's point was that in the past we had often blamed industrial relations when lack of investment was really the main cause of decline in British Leyland, and that the Ryder report rightly emphasized this. The Money Programme gave proper attention to this aspect. But the report also discusses overmanning.

Graham Turner estimated the extent of this as some 40,000 men. To refuse to discuss this by questioning the representation on the programme seemed a form of rhetoric. Wedgwood Benn could, after all, have made his objection and given his own views on the overmanning question.

The union representative talked generally about hope for expansion with increased investment. "It is generally recognized that living standards will improve and that as this happens people will need more cars." Generally recognized by whom?

The programme rightly raised two fundamental questions, the first of which concerned estimates of future world demand for cars. The Ryder report contains nothing about this, at least in the published sections, but it seems likely that the situation outlined by Graham Turner is most likely in the middle future—a sizeable world demand combined with overcapacity in the world's car plants.

The second question was never reached: is it desirable that cars should be the main component of Britain's economic base? Not so long ago the Socialist critique of English society involved having doubts about putting resources into motorways rather than public transport. Now it appears that, in three weeks, the Cabinet can decide that one of the main functions of Government in Britain is to keep up the production of cars, and possibly expand it. The prospect opens of a car corporate state Britain-Leyland competing with Japan-Toyota-Datsun, Renault-France and others.

Of course, in the near future, there is no alternative to Government intervention if any sort of car industry is to be kept going, and if employment is not to collapse. (An estimated million jobs are indirectly dependent on British Leyland.) But it is quite another thing to think of Britain's future in terms of cars. The ingenuity and manufacturing skill which Tony Wedgwood Benn rightly sees as an asset went in the past towards creating new and appropriate technologies. What is appropriate now?

Man Alive's programme on "X-ploitation"—the making of the X-certificate films with come-on titles like Six Saucy Virgins—was most interesting for its portraits of the people involved: a student at the University of York who took the idea for his latest script from Chaucer; Mr Sen, the suitably inscrutable Oriental owner of the English Film Company; a script-writer who felt that he had exhausted the limited number of preambles to getting into bed and asked us to remember that he too had literary ambitions; and most memorable, in the sense in which a bad meal is, Hazel Adair, formerly script-writer for Compact, Crossroads and Mrs Dale's Diary. I suppose that if you can write to one formula, you can write to another.

At least she was more clear-sighted, saying that this was where the money now lay, than those who saw their activity as "an entrée into films" ("I like classical things" "you have to start somewhere"), but arguably less pardonable.

ETV PREVIEWS

OUTDOOR ACTIVITIES

During the Easter holidays, both BBC and ITV previewed some of the programmes to be transmitted during the summer term and of new series starting in the autumn.

One third of this term's ITV series for the under 12s are listed as environmental studies or environmental science, and several other series include units which use the environment as a resource for learning. This is particularly relevant in the summer term when many children can work outside their schools. The programmes in Let's Go Out (Thames, nine to 12) are intended to encourage pupils to investigate their immediate environment. Eight topics are offered this term for teachers to use selectively, as models for the presentation of evidence, as starting points for topics and to give some idea of the interest inherent in apparently ordinary surroundings. The topics include Chinese restaurants, local radio, traffic and underground railways, and the series is supported by teachers notes and attractive posters.

The Protectors (Thames, nine to 12) is intended to make children aware of various agencies which protect the community. It examines topics, such as consumer protection, preventive medicine and the disposal of refuse and sewage. Although schools are increasingly interested in using local resources, it is not always easy to arrange visits. Some areas are dangerous and obviously unsuitable and some factories and local councils are tired of playing host to school parties. Television encourages children to visit places of interest, but it may soon stimulate desire for such experiences with little possibility of satisfaction.

Although it is not being transmitted during school time, it is well worth drawing parents and younger children's attention to a special edition of Rainbow on April 25. "Rainbow goes to hospital" is a half-hour documentary designed to overcome young children's fear. Viewers accompany a six-year-old boy into hospital and watch him being prepared for a tonsilectomy and waking up from the anaesthetic. This is the first of an occasional series of films, which will deal with situations which are bewildering and alarming to young children.

The BBC series for the summer term are less obviously environmentally based, although Watch (older infants), Springboard (radio, seven to nine) and Merry-go-Round (seven to nine) encourage an inquiring approach to the environment, while Out of the Past (nine to 12) has children out and about examining industrial archaeology. The three Merry-go-Round sex education programmes, broadcast annually since 1970, are being repeated but at different times from the regular series.

Two cheerful and lively BBC series new this term are The Orchestra (10 to 12) and The Electric Company (10 to 16). The Orchestra, specially written and narrated by Johnny Morris, takes a light-hearted look at the instruments of the orchestra in a story called Ting Tang the Elephant. The Electric Company is a series made by Children's Television Workshop, creators of Sesame Street, for children with reading difficulties. Used widely in the United States, The Electric Company teaches reading with cartoons humour and fun. The BBC are giving an experimental showing of 16 of the programmes to gauge teachers' reactions. Although originally made for children of seven to 10, the BBC suggest that the series is suitable for 10 to 16-year-olds.

Another series which helps reading is Listening and Reading (radio, 11 to 13). This series provides material to be taped for children with a reading age of seven to nine, but with interests appropriate to their actual age. Pupils follow the recordings in their own texts and teachers find that the series acts as a valuable stimulus for children who find reading offers insufficient reward for the effort involved.

In their preview programmes the BBC often talk to teachers of young children as if they were the same age as their pupils, but they also make a commendable effort to do more than just show extracts from programmes. Although some of the discussions with teachers using current series lacked enthusiasm or illustration, they represent progress towards the consideration of the scope and function of ETV which should be provided as a service for teachers.

ETV REVIEWS

HIDDEN CORNERS

Some three years ago BBC Bristol produced an attractive series called The French Way. Although at times self-indulgent, it provided a visually effective commentary on those aspects of rural life in France that cause eager francophiles to enthuse, while provoking critical reaction from more sanguine observers of everyday France.

Now running on BBC 1 (Tuesdays, 7.40 pm) is a companion from the same stable called The Italian Way. This seems a tighter, more purposeful series which is most enjoyable. All the elements that make learning about a foreign country so intriguing are present. There are delightful cameos of local personalities, informative comment on political, social or economic aspects of people's lives, a touch of mystery and superb camera work.

As with The French Way, the new series spends more time in hidden corners of the countryside than in the towns. We see peasants living by barter, sheep-milking in palisades, extraordinary shots of donkeys sharing front rooms and rams fighting. The Italian Way is on occasions more direct than its French predecessor. It becomes more involved in the lives of the Italians it shows.

One programme, for instance, takes some readings from Carlo Levi, contrasting what he had written 30 years ago with present conditions. It honestly reflected the appalling harshness of life in the south, and firmly criticized successive governments for bungling inefficiency—in insisting on wheat crops where wheat cannot grow, in not investing in industry and in wasting money on petty official squabbles.

What has come through in all the programmes whether set in Florence, Amalfi or the Mezzogiorno, is the passionate, indestructible and essentially simple love Italians have for their country. A country defined in terms of land, language, tradition and, above all, family rather than any political or social, idealism.

The Italian Way deals most effectively for instance with the important question of emigration showing why young people leave, and why they usually come back. It tells at some length the incredible tale of Filippo Gagliardi, who became the richest man in Venezuela before returning to build hospitals, schools and air-conditioned churches.

The series is strongest when it is not attempting to show stagey festivals. There was one disastrous programme in The French Way when it rained, too late to cut it out of the series. The same happens in The Italian Way where we watch local inhabitants dragging tree trunks for miles to take part in a pagan festival. The actual orgy took place several weeks later and the English audience was left bewildered at such a seemingly pointless exercise. Scenes such as these give the series occasionally a supercilious flavour, mocking rather than providing insights.

If any teacher were to brave the copyright laws and videotape this series he would find a variety of interesting classroom uses, both for classes in Italian and others with a European element. In addition to providing excellent background information on Italy, The Italian Way provides opportunities for writing commentaries with advanced pupils, making comparisons with France or Germany, for précis and oral summaries and as the basis for a variety of project work.

UNDER A BUSHEL

On the day (April 22) when the BBC were advertising the advent of The Electric Company, even during their hearty breakfast magazine programme, I chose to review, instead, a series on the arts which gets a look-in for only one term in the schools' broadcasting year.

I chose Art and Experience (BBC 4; Tuesday 09.45) as a reminder, when we are mainly preoccupied by the looming size of illiteracy and semi-literacy, that there are other standards to maintain as well.

The standards of Art and Experience are not the academic values of the Black Paper but the intellectual and aesthetic values all too often squeezed out in the current controversies. The BBC would be performing an educative service if they plugged Art and Experience during their jolly breakfast pleasantries and did not hide the series away in their annual programme under "General Studies" and tidily unimaginative description. I have no idea of the audience size but, granted the polarizations of educational controversy, the BBC's rather niggardly treatment of the series and the national predilection for doing-one's-own-thing as against enjoying and learning from the professional artist I can imagine that it is small.

Later this term Art and Experience offers radiovision studies of the little-known and quite extraordinary maze sculptures—in situ—of Michael Ayrton, the work of Elizabeth Frink and of novelist John Fowles, playwright James Saunders and poet Peter Porter. The quality of investigation makes comparison with some of the vaunted fashion-based "arts" series on television unflattering to this schools' series.

First, however, it has three programmes devoted to the past and present of jazz. Jazz has, contrary to popular misconceptions, a great deal to do with standards. It is the foremost form of improvised music to emerge (in contrast to the rigidities of Rock and Pop, with which it is confused). It is in fact so demanding and idiosyncratic that the moguls of pop entertainment packaging will not deal in it and it survives out of the uncompromising dedication of its performers.

The programme on April 22 was a characteristically intelligent, uncompromising exposé. Michael Garrick, one of Britain's most creative and articulate jazz musicians, and his sextet, talked, played and illustrated historical and technical points. The two qualities they isolated in their definition of jazz—accuracy and passion (what Michael Longley, the poet, has called "such precise rampage")—marked their playing of Blues on Blues and Spirits of Motion, though Norman Winstone's vocal reiteration of the title on the latter seemed unnecessary.

It is a sad reflection on the quality of our education that such profuse creative fluency as jazz musicians like this possess should reach such a small public. The same might be said of the series as a whole.

BRIEFINGS

RADIO AND TV

OU and FE

What's News? (Saturday, 7.00, VHF 3)

A discussion on the criteria used by education correspondents to select topics and news items. Taking part are representatives of The Guardian, The Times and the BBC; they end by questioning the usefulness of the education correspondent.

Reward Preferences (Saturday, 11.20, VHF 4; Tuesday, 17.45, VHF 3)

Investigates the ways in which social and family backgrounds influence children's preferences for different rewards and their motivation to succeed. Includes interviews with children and teachers.

Participation or Propaganda (Sunday, 9.50, VHF 4; Wednesday, 6.40, VHF 3)

Taking Coventry as an example of corporate planning, the tape looks at the degree of public participation in council decision making. Shows the publicity necessary to get people to show an interest in local government.

A Purely Educational Problem? (Monday, 18.45, VHF 3)

Examines the relationships between educational problems and more general social difficulties. Looks at how chief officers take their decisions and how local goverment reorganization has affected them.

Choices for Tomorrow (Monday, 23.05, BBC 1)

In "House Hunt", John Page, Professor of Building Science at Sheffield University, illustrates the lessons to be learned from the past 20 years during which a great variety of housing has been produced.

Worlds Without Sun. (Wednesday, 19.05, BBC 2)

A visit to the island of Lanzarote in the Canaries where refugees from the Spanish invaders in the fifteenth century used to hide in a network of volcanic caves now open to the tourist.

For schools

You and Me. (Monday: Wednesday; Friday, 10.45, BBC 1)

Programmes about water for the pre-school infant; where to find it and what it does. On Monday a story about a race across the river, on Wednesday Dad waters the garden and on Friday Mum and child find out what floats and what sinks.

New Horizons. (Monday, 11.45; Thursday, 14.35, BBC 1)

In "What Sex is Your Job?" 16 to 18-year-olds look at the characteristics of women's work in three areas of employment to distinguish the types of work available to men and women.

Seeing and Doing. (Tuesday, 9.30; Thursday, 11.23, ITV)

The first of two programmes for six-year-olds. In "On a Building Site" children watch men at work on a demolition site and find out about the various machines used. They are encouraged to make their own models.

Science All Around. (Tuesday, 10.25, BBC 1)

Nine to 11-year-olds see the growth and development of a seed into a plant, the formation of a flower, pollination and the growth of a new seed. Emphasis is given to the necessity for fertilisation in both plants and animals.

In "Round and Round" seven- to eight-year-olds are introduced to the concept of angles both as "the union of two non-collinear rays with a common end point" and as a measure of rotation. Used as illustrations are radio scanners, torches and cameras.

History: Long Ago. (Tuesday, 14.00, VHF4)

A journey back in time for eight to eleven-year-olds to visit the monastery at Melrose, in Scotland, as it might have been in the 14th century. There is a dramatized account of a day in the life of a monk in those times, and an interview with a monk living at Melrose today.

My World: Real Life. (Wednesday, 9.30; Friday, 11.00, ITV)

First year infants are taken on board a lifeboat and take part in the rescue procedure to find how important the service is to those at sea.

Our Changing World. (Thursday, 11.40, VHF4)

"Travel to Work" aims at showing 13 to 16-year-olds that Britain is not the only European country with a large migrant work force. Discusses how successful the migrations have been elsewhere, from the point of view of the individual development and social life of the countries concerned.

Break

Just for starters . . .

Springtime stirrings in publishing: Peter Usborne, joint founder of Private Eye all those years ago and, more recently and more importantly, inventor of Macdonald Starters, that gold mine of the British Publishing Corporation, and starter of Macdonald Educational, has set up on his own now for two years.

The first books under the Usborne imprint came out in March and a whole lot more are due out at the end of this month. While like the Macdonald books, they have much to offer schools—particularly the next batch, which are topic history books—Peter Usborne is still moving in the direction he was going at Macdonald—namely, aiming at the family market, concentrating on bright presentation, reasonable prices and general jollity.

Among the titles due out in the summer are some he describes as "thoroughly irresponsible and enjoyable battle game books". For although Peter Usborne has done a very thorough job of casing the school market in the years since he joined BP from business school in Fontainebleau, his real penchant is for what Americans would call fun books. "I'd really love to publish Asterix more than anything else I can imagine."

He dislikes being labelled a jokes' man—a label which is pinned to him because of his association with Private Eye. "I love jokes but I never make them." None the less, he's scarcely a bore.

He started from scratch in children's book publishing in the late sixties and early seventies, "when people were obsessed by posh children's books, adults children's books, which reached their epitome with a set of illustrations which were printed upside down and no one, neither the editors nor the readers, noticed.

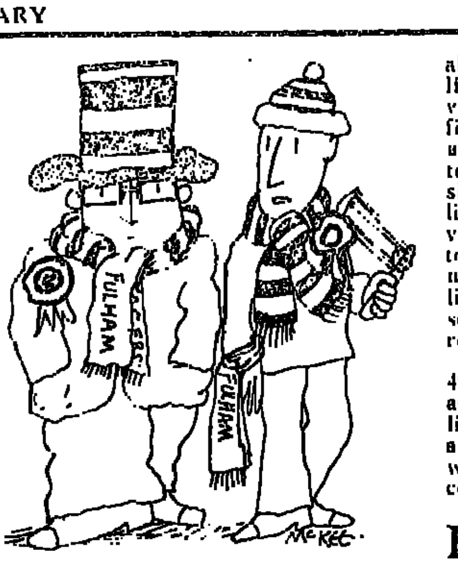
"When we started the Starters we didn't know anything about it at all so we got 60 people to paint a picture of the Flood and then took them to schools and let teachers and children choose which style they liked best. The teachers liked boring, grey, rainy OK rubbish. The children liked the very colourful, bright, funny ones—the stuff I liked. There was just one chap in the middle, and that set the style."

Starters have sold more than 25 million copies since then and are translated into 16 languages. No wonder then that BPC are backing Usborne's venture (to the extent of guaranteeing his overdraft) rather than see him set up in competition.

History in the writing

Ruth and Derek Wilson are a 'one couple firm. He describes himself as an author-historian; he writes books on the reformation period. She does his typing and assisting. But now they have a new venture in the form of a quarterly journal, New History.

"It exists solely to provide factual appraisals by a small reviewing panel of all the new books likely to interest people who enjoy reading history." In other words, it covers the sort of books you can buy in proper book shops but not textbooks or academic tomes—though they do plan to do a textbook supplement towards the end of the year.



"Please, headmaster, stop worrying about what I had to promise 4C in order to get the tickets."

The first issue has just come out with reviews of 50 books which range from Richard Humble's Marco Polo, of which they say: "There is little new which can be written about Marco Polo and Mr. Humble has not written it" to A. Hassell Smith's County and Court: Government and Politics in Norfolk 1558-1603, "an excellent piece of regional study".

They already have 60 books waiting to be reviewed for the July issue which is a measure of the publishers enthusiasm for the venture. So far, however, that enthusiasm has not, with two exceptions, gone on from sending review copies to buying ads in the mag. The Wilson's have a long way to go from their present subscription list of 1,000, for the July issue, to the 5,000 Ruth Wilson thinks they will need to sell before they start making anything out of it.

And even books

Given the implications of Hugh Jenkins's pronouncements on the future of libraries, we may have cause to be thankful for economic stringency. What otherwise would save us from following the pattern set by Salt Lake City where a library suited to the space age has recently opened complete with quadraphonic sound, three-screen film projection, an art gallery, stock market ticker tape, and film editing equipment—and even books?

"A three-ring circus" was how one disapproving librarian described the grand opening—though it was actually just a clown to entertain the kiddies while the designer, a 43-year-old Dutch librarian named Guy Schuurman, explained the new philosophy the project represents: "Libraries used to be for old ladies who wanted to nose through books. Now they're centres where all of the information resources and services of the community can be pooled into a network to improve the quality of life".

Besides the frills, which include a kitchen so patrons can pack a lunch, the library also takes its information seriously, giving an indication of available retrieval systems. There is a telex link-up to a national interlibrary service; a catalogue lists 800 books specifically for subscribers to order by phone and have sent through the post; a telecopier transmits and receives facsimile pages from books in various libraries; a community information service relays requests from the elderly for transport or the delivery of subsidized meals. People can borrow from the library a Rembrandt reproduction or sculpture replica as well as a pop record or a comic book.

In its first month, the library had 49,000 visitors, compared to only 13,000 at the more central and larger main library in Salt Lake City. So far it is a great success and everyone hopes it will continue that way—to justify its cost of £600,000.

Publish and be open

Having developed a successful formula for academic books at Methuen, three young editors have struck out on their own with Open Books, a new imprint, with the first books due out next year. The formula essentially breaks up large textbooks into their component subjects, with cheap editions and specialized authors for each.

When we recently visited the cheerful trio of editors they were working out of an empty Chelsea flat with only a portable table and four plastic beach chairs between them. Though Mitchell Beazley are financing the imprint, Open Books remain independent and have just moved into permanent quarters in Shaftesbury Avenue. Managing director Patrick Taylor and his colleagues, Helen Fraser and Grant McIntyre, effuse spirited optimism, but at the time we talked no contracts had been signed. Each took a turn bubbling over with information while the other two monitored for confidential indiscretions.

Now that some contracts have been signed, their mysterious allusions to the revolution they bring to publishing come attached with titles. Three series are underway: The Developing Child, Curriculum Studies and Psychology and Education. Uniformity in layout dictates that all books in a series will have the same number of pages, complementary subjects and artfully designed covers.

The Developing Child series, is an example, so far it has eight well-known academics, like Rudolf Schaffer on Mother-Child Interaction and Tom Bower on Visual Perception, describing their specialisms to a wide market, from mothers to the helping professions as well as students. The editors reject the standard approach of having heavy authoritative books that are not only expensive but inconvenient for students.

Though not advocates of disposable living Open Books take more cognizance of today's books becoming obsolete tomorrow. "There is no reason why a writer should not be able to do a book in the long vac", says Miss Fraser. Unlike their counterparts at some staider publishing houses, the editors go searching for their writers at colleges of education, polytechnics as well as at universities.

Optimistically, they anticipate a print run of 20,000 for each book. They also expect the whole of each series to appear within a short time, making a heroic first-year production of 45 books. The series will be published at first in paperback (with stiff-cover library editions) and, as the final revolutionary gesture, a price of 75p.

REMEDIAL DEPARTMENT
Ellesmere Port Catholic High School
Capenhurst Lane, Whitby, Ellesmere Port, Cheshire

Required for September 1975, in this new, expanding 11-18 co-educational comprehensive school. There are at present some 900 pupils on roll, rising to just over 1,000 in September 1975.

Assistant Teacher required to take full share of Remedial teaching throughout the school. In the first two years there are Remedial classes and in the 3rd Year and upwards remedial teaching is on a withdrawal basis. A teacher is required with a strong sense of commitment to the pastoral and academic needs of slow-learning pupils. An ability to help with the teaching of Mathematics to slow learning pupils would be an added advantage.

All replies immediately to the Headteacher at the School (R. A. Flewitt, B.A., M.Ed.). Closing date Tuesday, 13th May, 1975.

SUPPORT SERVICES—Tuition Team
Knutsford County High School (Mixed)
Bexton Road, Knutsford, Cheshire

Teacher in charge Tuition Team (Scale 2) to be responsible for the oversight of withdrawal tuition for pupils with learning problems. The person appointed will work with a senior Head of Department to devise courses for all years although special emphasis may be made in the first two.

This growing 11-18 school, 1,250 on roll in September, is about to introduce a Support Services Agency within which withdrawal tuition is an important element.

Send S.A.E. (foolscap) for application form. Closing date 14th May.

WE KNOW TEACHERS

The most effective way of reaching secondary school teachers is through The Times Educational Supplement.

Research shows that 70% of all state secondary school teachers with buying and/or recommending responsibility for school equipment read the TES.

So if you want to tell teachers about anything from a test tube to a complete set of classroom furniture, use the TES.

Phone Dennis Styles in London on 01-837 1234 or Advertisement Manager in Scotland on 031-225 6875 and get all the facts and figures.

opportunities with Nottinghamshire

Applications for posts in Secondary Schools are invited from experienced teachers and students in their final year of training. Applications are particularly welcome from those specialising in Mathematics, Boys' Craft, Modern Languages (particularly French) and Physics. Nottinghamshire is a large Authority, able to offer teachers in all parts of the County excellent career prospects. We have outstanding support services—a large Advisory Staff, Teachers' Centres and In-Service Courses. The County has some of the Country's foremost recreational and sporting facilities.

Interviews are now being arranged. Application forms and our booklet are obtainable from your College or from the Director of Education (Sch.12).

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT

SECONDARY EDUCATION VACANCIES FOR SEPTEMBER 1975

Applications are invited from experienced teachers and from students completing teacher training this year. There are two main ways of appointment. Applicants may opt for appointment to an individual vacancy in a Secondary School in the new authority and a list of such vacancies is given below. Further vacancies in Secondary Schools will be advertised regularly during the coming months. Additionally, or alternatively, candidates may ask to be considered for appointment in the first instance to a "pool" of teachers in anticipation of further vacancies. If offered appointment they would then be asked to consider suitable vacancies when these arose at a later stage. If they so wish, candidates may apply both for individual posts and the "pool".

Students may obtain application forms from the appropriate officer at the College or Department. Other teachers may obtain forms from:

THE CHIEF EDUCATION OFFICER,
STAFFING BRANCH, EDUCATION OFFICE,
MARGARET STREET, BIRMINGHAM B3 3BU

There are schemes for assistance with removal expenses, for advance of salary to teachers taking up first appointments, and for mortgage facilities in approved cases.

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE
ROTHWELL-DESBOROUGH SECONDARY SCHOOL
Greening Road, Rothwell, Kettering
DESIGN CENTRE
PRACTICAL SUBJECTS

This co-educational secondary school opened in new buildings in January, 1955, additional new buildings being provided in 1959 and 1973.

The Department of Education and Science has approved plans for re-organization under which the school becomes fully comprehensive (11-18) in September, 1976, when the school receives its first unselected intake. Extension buildings due for completion in 1976, and subsequently, will provide the full range of facilities for comprehensive education. Present accommodation includes a Design Centre for Practical Subjects (Woodwork, Technical Drawing, Metalwork, Art Studios, Pottery areas) with Homecraft and Needlework in the main building.

The school is sited within its own playing fields in a rural setting four miles from Kettering from which there is a regular British Rail service to London, other cities and the north.

The number of pupils, 870 in September, 1975, will progressively increase to 1,100 plus an estimated Sixth Form of 200 pupils.

Increased staffing is required for September, 1975. Applications are invited from College leavers and experienced teachers. Applicants should be keenly interested in a developing comprehensive school and wish to partake and assist in the extension of courses, etc., to G.C.E. "A" level, etc. At present subjects are taught to G.C.E. "O" level and C.S.E. standards.

A TEACHER is required to enlarge the staff of this centre able to offer a combination of two or more subjects—WOODWORK, TECHNICAL DRAWING, METALWORK, HOMECRAFTS, MOTOR CAR MAINTENANCE, ELECTRONICS.

Application forms (stamped addressed envelope) may be obtained from the Headmaster to whom completed forms should be returned with copies of testimonials and the names of referees.

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE
MILTON KEYNES DIVISION
STANTONBURY CAMPUS—MILTON KEYNES
ENVIRONMENTAL STUDIES TEACHER

Required for September 1975 with a specialism in either HISTORY or GEOGRAPHY to work in the Faculty "Man in Time and Place", a broadly based Humanities Faculty covering History, Geography, Environmental Studies, Community Studies and Social Studies.
The candidate should be particularly interested to develop Environmental Studies and Community Studies in mixed ability classes with particular emphasis on the emerging urban environment of the locality. The school is pioneering a new "O" level with the Associated Examining Board which focuses on the Urban Environment.
Applications welcomed from newly qualified candidates but Scale [illegible] may be available for suitably experienced applicant.
The Stantonbury Campus will ultimately provide secondary education for 4,500 students in the age range 12 to 19, distributed through three schools of 1,500 students, sharing the facilities of a central resource area. As a result of close cooperation with the local authorities, a large leisure centre, theatre, music centre, health centre, ecumenical centre, community college, youth centre, shopping and recreational facilities will be included on the site for shared use with the surrounding community.
The campus opened in September 1974 with 280 students and numbers will increase by 300 a year. Help with housing may be available. Removal expenses payable in approved cases.
Application as soon as possible by letter, with names and addresses of two referees to Geoffrey Cooksey, M.A., Director, Stantonbury Campus, Stantonbury, Milton Keynes MK14 6BN. Telephone Wolverton (0908) 314055. Full information will be sent immediately.

Appointment of

HEAD TEACHER

Applications are invited for the Headship of this day school for maladjusted children following the appointment of the present Head to a lectureship in special education.

The school was opened in new and purpose built premises in 1970 and has accommodation for 50 boys and girls between 6 and 16 years of age. It is situated in a delightful area on the outskirts of the city and adjacent to the Peak National Park. In addition to taking advantage of its position to develop a wide programme of outdoor pursuits the school has also built up close relationships with neighbouring primary and secondary schools.

For this important Headship the Education Committee is looking for a man or woman experienced in working with emotionally disturbed children and interested in their educational, behavioural and social problems. The possession of a relevant diploma in special education will be an advantage. Salary: £4,296-£4,824.

Application forms are obtainable from the Chief Education Officer, P.O. Box 67, Leopold Street, Sheffield, S1 1RJ, and should be returned to him as soon as possible.

Tutorial Unit for pupils with behaviour problems

A unit is being established by the Borough in the near future in premises not attached to a school for a small number of pupils mainly secondary age who are presenting serious behaviour problems in schools. The aim of the unit is to give them concentrated attention from skilled teachers over a relatively short period of time to enable them to progress educationally and socially and to take their place acceptably in the normal school.

The Authority therefore are seeking experienced qualified teachers for September to set up and run the unit. The successful candidates will have experience of dealing with difficult adolescents and sympathetic understanding of their problems, coupled with imagination and a desire to teach them effectively so they may be reintegrated into the school system. Teacher in Charge, Scale 3; Assistant Teacher, Scale 2.

Application forms and further particulars available from Chief Education Officer, Town Hall, Barking, Essex, returnable by 15th May, 1975.

DIRECTOR OF STUDIES

SALARY SCALE £6,270–£7,559

plus £229 Threshold (under review)

Appointments may be made at any point in the scale. Applicants should be capable of making a significant contribution to the academic work of the polytechnic in teaching, research and course development. They should have high qualifications and a special interest in one or other of the main activities of the School.

FACULTY OF BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

SCHOOL OF BUSINESS STUDIES

The work includes C.N.A.A. sandwich and part-time degrees and Higher National Diploma and Certificate courses, and contributions to existing and proposed degree courses in other schools. A wide range of research projects have been set up, and future planning also includes a Master's Degree in Business Administration.

FACULTY OF SOCIAL AND HEALTH SCIENCES

SCHOOL OF BEHAVIOURAL SCIENCES

The School embraces divisions of Psychology, Speech Therapy and Vocational Guidance. It makes a major contribution to the Faculty's full-time C.N.A.A. degrees in Social Science, Social Work and Social Administration, is developing a new Psychology option on a sandwich basis, and a new degree in Speech Therapy, and offers a range of diploma courses in various aspects of vocational guidance, as well as contributing to many other courses throughout the polytechnic.

SCHOOL OF SOCIAL STUDIES

The School has divisions of Sociology, Social Work, Social Administration and Youth and Community Work. It embraces pure and applied studies in a wide range of degree and diploma, full-time and part-time courses within the School and contributes widely to other polytechnic courses.

FACULTY OF TECHNOLOGY

SCHOOL OF MECHANICAL & INDUSTRIAL ENGINEERING

The School provides courses at degree, diploma and certificate level, including a new C.N.A.A. sandwich degree in Engineering (in association with another School), and new diplomas in Mechanical and Production Engineering. Part-time degrees, the development of T.E.C. Higher Diploma courses and post-graduate courses are planned. There is already a good tradition of research.

SCHOOL OF CIVIL ENGINEERING

Expansion has led to the establishing of this new School separately from the School of Building. A proposed new C.N.A.A. sandwich degree in Civil Engineering is to start in September, and there is a range of diploma and certificate courses with contributions to other Schools. There is a growing involvement in consultancy and research within the School.

The Polytechnic occupies a semi-rural position on a 114-acre campus overlooking the sea at Jordanstown, a pleasant and quiet residential area. There is a scheme of assistance with removal expenses.
